It will probably be early in May before Mr. Roosevelt leaves Egypt. He has an appointment to lecture in Berlin about the middle of that month, and he will also deliver an address in Christiania, before the Nobel Peace Prize Committee. He will also speak in public at the Sorbonne, in Paris, and will make hurried trips to Rome, Vienna and Buda-Pest. While in Italy, he will probably visit King Edward of England and Queen Alexandra, who have lately acquired a beautiful villa near Naples as a holiday residence. In Paris he will remain about three days. The French government is preparing to receive him with the highest honors, and the various literary and scientific bodies will lionize and banquet him. He will be the guest of President Fallières, and will meet the "Forty Immortals" in the Academy.

Before begining his trip down the Nile, Mr. Roosevelt sent this message by a special runner:

"Colonel Roosevelt states that he has heartily enjoyed the entire trip through British East Africa, Uganda Protectorate, and the Lado Enclave. He is particularly pleased over his success in hunting white rhinoceroses in the Belgian Congo. He feels that the results of the expedition will be of real and great scientific value."

Uganda, which Mr. Roosevelt has just visited, has an eventful history. The Church Missionary Society in 1876 sent a party of missionaries there, two of whom, including the leader, were killed soon after their arrival, but the mission was established next year. Two years later, Catholic missionaries arrived. Intrigues and rivalries sprang up, which were fomented by the Arabs, who wished to make King Mtesa a Mohammedan. Mtesa died, and his successor, Mwanga, became the enemy of the missionaries, causing the murder of Bishop Hannington in 1885, and persecuting the Protestant native Christians with great cruelty. In 1888, through Mohammedan plots, Mwanga was driven away from his capital and all the missionaries were excluded from the country. A year later, the Mohammedans were driven out and the King was restored.

Then the British East Africa Trading Company, which had for several years been growing in influence in Uganda, took general supervision of the government, in the interest of peace and order. But Mwanga's weakness and vacillation were a continuous source of danger. In 1894 a British protectorate was established. In 1897 Mwanga, resenting British control, fled from his capital. He was at once declared deposed, and the infant Daudi Chua was proclaimed King, with a regent during his minority. Since 1898 there has been no serious outbreak in Uganda, and the country is progressing in education, commerce and general prosperity. There are now over 50,000 professed Christians in a land which, no longer ago than 1882, was literally one of "black heathenism."

PRESIDENT TAFT'S FAMOUS SMILE

THE President of the United States is something of a philosopher. Rarely does he permit anything to disturb his serenity, or to interfere with his unbounded good nature. His smile, as everybody knows, is something that has become a prominent part of his personality. President Taft without his smile would not be himself. During his recent visit to New York, where he was beset by conflicting political factions, he preserved the same good nature and beamed the same irresistible smile as though he were the chief guest at a banquet instead of being in the thick of party disputation. At a dinner in Washington recently he spoke of the public criticisms of his administration, and said that he might feel sensitive, but for the fact that all of his predecessors in the Presidency had been subjected to a similar experience. He rather felt that he was to be congratulated on having been criticised in his first year of office; the next three years, he believed, would be pleasant and enjoyable, no matter what the critics might say. Mr. Andrew Carnegie, who is a shrewd observer of men and events, fairly expressed the public attitude toward President Taft in a recent interview. He says: "I think him one of the best men who ever occupied the Presidential chair. He gets blamed for a lot of things he can't help. He is doing his best all the time, and I wish all the people would understand that."

A "Little Friend" Sends Thanks

Dear Mr. Klopsch: I received the book, Hero Tales, and think it very nice. I think the story of Lincoln is fine. It came as a Christmas present, sent by my uncle, Horace Stocker, and I am very much pleased with it. I am only ten years old, but I can read the story quite well. Please accept my thanks. Your little friend, Cromwell, Ind. RALPH K. MOCK.

Woman and the Cost of Living

PROFESSOR PATTEN, who fills the chair of Political Economy in the University of Pennsylvania, takes a novel view of the causes of the present high cost of living. In an article in the Independent he does not attribute it, as others have done, to gold over-production, to decrease in the value of our natural resources, or to the undue exploitation of the worker. He believes it arises from three causes: the bad distribution of population, the distance between consumer and producer, and the new status of woman. The wife, he says, is no longer a creator of industry in the home, as she was in former days. Now, everything must be purchased outside, and what with this increased expense, the false standard of living and elaborate dressing, she has become "often its chief burden." He points out that formerly a $1,000 income sufficed to keep an ordinary home in comfort, as the wife's industry and thrift made it go as far as a much larger sum. Her baking, preserving and dressmaking all saved money. The professor concludes that "the essential conditions of home life cannot be neglected without bringing prosperity to a standstill."

This will appeal to most people as a rather one-sided and partial view of the case. Certainly, while it may apply to some, it cannot be true of the majority of our American homes. Let us hear, through the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, what the wives and mothers themselves have to say on this particular phase of the subject. Their letters will prove interesting and helpful reading to many others.

Looking Toward Jerusalem

THERE is something significant in the steady growth of the Jewish colonies in Palestine. Since the great political changes in the Turkish empire, and the adoption of the new Turkish Constitution, the dream of the Jewish people of a restored Hebrew commonwealth comes nearer to being within measurable distance of realization than it has been in many centuries. Zionism, though possessing little interest for the Gentile world, is still the dearest hope of the Jew. He now regards that hope, not as he formerly viewed it, as being afar off, but as well within his own definite horizon. The glorious sunrise for which he prayed so long is almost due, and hints of its approach are already reddening the Eastern skies. Jewish colonies are multiplying in the old land. There is a stream of immigration flowing toward the Holy City. These immigrants are drawn from the 3,500,000 Jews in Russia, from the 1,800,000 in Austro-Hungary, the 500,000 in Roumania, and the 150,000 in England. They are building up the ancient "waste places" and causing the once fertile valleys and plains to blossom anew. They are becoming land-owners in Bethlehem, in Nazareth, in Lydda, in Joppa, and even in the very suburbs of Jerusalem, and their numbers and holdings are steadily increasing.

There are indications that Jewish autonomy in Palestine may not be very remote. Even in free America, where the Jew is seen at his best, surrounded by advantages which he never enjoyed in other Gentile lands, this goal is being kept in sight, and the revival of Jewish nationality, the reinstitution of the Jewish State, the establishment of a great Hebrew University in the city of David and of an international court to promote the world's peace are among the questions that are occupying the minds of thoughtful members of the race, who view the future as being bright with promise.

Methodist Work in Rome

SOME of our contemporaries seem to have misunderstood the situation in connection with the recent incident in Rome, when Mr. Fairbanks declined the honor of a presentation to the Pope. One newspaper belittles the religious work of the Methodist Church in the Italian capital, and even goes so far as to say that "all of the real Italians that could be made real Methodists, by a thousand missionaries in a thousand years, could travel comfortably in one taxicab." While we do not question the sincerity of this influential paper in making this statement, we would simply present the facts, which speak for themselves.

The Methodist Church was established in Italy twenty-nine years ago, and has now four thousand communicants in that country. It began work in Rome in 1873. It opened a girls' school in 1888, in a building which was formerly a nunnery, and there are to-day hundreds of bright Italian girls under Protestant training in that school, the principal of which is Signorina Italia Garibaldi, the granddaughter of the famous Liberator and an ardent Protestant. Besides this school there is an American and Italian church, a theological school, a college for boys, residences for the faculty, and a printing establishment—all Methodist. The working staff in Rome includes three married missionaries and their wives and five single missionaries.

According to the most conservative estimates, which there is not the slightest reason for disputing, many hundreds of Italians in Rome have become Protestants as the result of Methodist efforts. The propaganda has at no time been in any sense an offensive one; it has simply consisted of a careful but intelligent and persistent presentation of the Gospel, and it has quite as much justification as the efforts of the Roman church to win adherents in Protestant communities. So much, then, for the taxicab proposition. We may add that our Methodist brethren have active missions in forty cities and towns throughout Italy, with seventy Italian teachers, all Protestants; forty-six Sabbath Schools well attended, and a large and growing church membership.

Of course, there are different ways of looking at any subject, and different conclusions may be reached. We do not question the right nor the honesty of any paper in looking at this subject through its own spectacles. We only wish to present the facts concerning Methodist work in Rome, its extent and its results. This presentation furnishes the real key to the situation. If the Methodists, after all their efforts, had really made no more converts than could have been carried in one, or in a hundred, taxicabs, the Vatican would never have considered them of sufficient importance to refuse any American an audience on their account. Facts are facts, and should be stated as such, no matter what we think of the other features of the case.

Flying Too High

THE longer one lives, if he be sober-minded, and especially if he be a Christian, the smaller and poorer seem the prizes of ambition for which so many are struggling in this world—the splendors of wealth, the glory of war, the trumpet-blasts of fame in the political arena. How long do they last, and how much do they bring of happiness and peace? Every one knows how the fickle wheel of fortune has turned for many who were once at the top. How names that once were spoken with admiration and praise have been tossed about in ridicule and scorn! It is pathetic to think of some of them, especially those like the men who have just been shown to be bribe-takers in the New York Legislature, who once "flew high" and held themselves proudly above their fellows. They were once known as "leaders of men" and everywhere welcomed with honor and display. Who are they to-day? Who so poor as do them reverence? Every one recalls some of the bright stars of the social and business world, a little while ago splendidly shining, but now in the dust and trampled under foot of men. It is well indeed to have the friendship and good opinion of our fellows; but there is many a so-called prize in life not worth the struggle. Among these the wise man will count the fierce strain to reach the heights of popular favor, to win the smiles and adulations of the multitude, to get publicity with broad, admiring headlines, and even to ride under triumphal arches. The winds are too fickle. The voices that to-day cry "Crown him!" are too ready to cry "Crucify him!" to-morrow. You may never have the chance to win glory on some field of battle, and to return a hero from the war; or to be some great one in the political, commercial or social world. Have a laudable ambi n, and make all due and honorable effort to be "s e-body." Do something with your life and your l- ents. But do not overshoot the mark. Rathe be content to "walk and not faint." Plodding is r ly harder than flying, and requires a higher sor of courage.

Behind the Times

SEVERAL years ago, when there was a perio of calm in the history of South and Central A r- ica and the West Indies, the magazines and n s- papers were full of articles describing exactly w the dove of peace had lit in the midst of these r re than turbulent communities, and prophesying at she would stay, and that the various republics w ld develop commerce and the arts as a result.

As a whole, probably things have gone better; ut as we look back one is reluctantly forced to the n- clusion that what peace and good order has e- vailed has not been so much the result of a cle er idea of what government should be as a fear o n- terference by the United States, which, though ot desiring an increase of territory, has become w ry of these carnivals of blood under the title of r o- lutions which were taking place at her very d rs. The Monroe doctrine, in whose maintenance e ry person on this continent is vitally interested, m es us really the guardian of the lands this side of e Atlantic. It also follows that we should not ay the dog in the manger, not allowing other coun es to interfere when their interests are involved, d yet doing nothing ourselves to keep peace. I l- izing this, our government stopped the insurre on in Cuba, saw that a legal election was held, and en handed the island back to the Cuban people.

Central America has shown, in the last w months, that she is also behind the times. In Ze ya she had a dictator who was President only in n e. Madriz is supposed to be a man likely to carr on his policies, as he was Zelaya's own choice. he government has not been run in the interest of Nicaragua as a whole, but to enrich one dict or after another, and all their friends and depend ts. At present there is one President, more or less e- curely seated in the executive chair, and two ot rs trying to jostle him out and get the uncomfort le seat for themselves. Hundreds of Americans d Europeans have interests in the country, and ey seem disposed to take a hand in the troubles d try and bring order out of chaos. As they are he only people in the country who realize that we re living in the twentieth century, they could ha ly be blamed for participating actively.

A Pet Tiger

A SHIP came into port at Philadelphia the other day, having on board a singular pet. It was a tiger, pretty nearly full grown. The loungers at the river front interested themselves in watching the animal sunning itself on the deck. Visitors who gathered about to look at the creature were asked to shake hands with the crew's pet. It had been taken on board when a cub, and had been petted and cared for like a baby by the crew. While it was quite tame with the men of the crew, when the strangers approached it showed its teeth and gave a snarl of the jungle in defiance. Sheaths were over the claws and a rope muzzle over the face, but these would have been only a fly-netting and thread if the beast had only determined to assert himself. There is a tiger in every one, which is hard to tame. At the least provocation or unfriendly circumstance he appears on the scene, with fangs and claws ready for action. The first glass of champagne, or a simple game of gambling, the book so delightful and yet tinged with a suggestion of evil, the play so fascinating with its hints of wrong; the friend so comely, talented and magnetic, but with jealousy, treachery, malice and impurity, however well disguised, are the tigers that make dangerous pets. These beasts of appetite in the human soul are referred to by Paul in his letter to a spiritual son, where he enjoins the selection of leaders of sound faith to withstand and correct the influence of certain persons, even in the church, whose wild, wicked impulses brought danger and damage to others. In mentioning them he says:

One of themselves, even a prophet of their own, said, The Cretians are always liars, evil beasts. (Titus 1 : 12.)

The Full-Grown Pet Tiger and His Keepers on Shipboard

Wrecks at Sea

The fierce storms of early February wrought fearful wreckage on most of the seas of the world. The steamship Lima, owned by the Pacific Navigation Company, was driven ashore and wrecked on one of the islands of the Huamblin Passage of the Straits of Magellan. The British steamship Hathumet rescued two hundred and five of the persons on board. The chief pilot and fifty passengers perished; and the snapping of a cable and a desperate sea made it necessary for the rescuing ship to leave eighty-eight on the wrecked vessel, crying for help. All were saved.

The French Atlantic steamship General Chanzy was lost in the Mediterranean Sea, on a reef just north of the island of Minorca. One hundred and fifty lives were lost, among them the son of E. Hoskier, the Danish Consul-General in Paris, who lost his wife and daughter in the Charity Bazaar fire. It is thought that there was an explosion. Of the passengers and crew only one person survives, Marcel Rodel, the Algerian customs official, who was so dazed that he was unable to give any intelligent account of the disaster. It is said that the lights on that coast were poor, and that the Spanish government will have new ones established there at once.

The United States naval tug Nina, with twenty-eight men, left Norfolk the 6th of February to go to Boston, and up to February 16 she had not been reported, although hopes are still entertained that she may have weathered the storm. The appalling loss of life by this storm, which clouds the civilized world with sorrow, is a symbol of the fearful wreckage of souls driven against the rocks of temptation by the storms of time. Faith, the only safe anchorage in such storms, is enjoined by the apostle in these words:

Holding faith, and a good conscience; which some having put away, concerning faith have made shipwreck. (I. Tim. 1 : 19.)

An Interesting Centenarian

Mr. John M. Butler has just entered upon his one hundredth year, and signalized his anniversary by uniting with the Methodist Church at Ocean Grove, N. J. He is in good health, is well dressed, and alert on almost all subjects. He has eaten oysters every day for years. He never tasted liquor but once or twice when he was a young man, and did not like it. He smoked a cigar and a half, over eighty years ago, which made him sick, and he has never used tobacco since. The reporter of a paper found him at the beach the other day, looking out upon the ocean, and listened to him talk in an entertaining manner for two hours. During that conversation he made this reference to his sainted wife: "Mary was the best woman God ever made. The woman he made for me. She's been dead these forty years, but I still see her as I have seen her all my life. That is why I love to sit here by the sea. Whether the sea is gray, as it is to-day, or whether it is blue under the summer sky, it reminds me of her eyes, and I love to listen to it tell me of her. I promised Mary if I ever joined a church it would be hers, and I have done so." The old man brushed away some tears that fell on his face as the subject was changed. His love for his angel Mary reminds us of Abraham's love for Sarah and of his intense sorrow at her removal from him.

And Abraham came to mourn for Sarah, and to weep for her. (Gen. 23 : 2.)

Bryan Against the Saloon

Few utterances fraught with more significance have been made in recent years than the one which William Jennings Bryan gave the other day, through a paper in Lincoln, Neb., declaring that the Democratic party of the nation had to divorce itself from the organized liquor influence of the country if it would expect to have any future. After commending most of the acts of his own State Legislature, Democratic for the first time, he said that the one blot on the year's session was its refusal to pass the local option bill, allowing the people to decide whether they would have the sale of liquor or not. Such statements from such a source are revolutionary in their character. There is no disguising the fact that there has been a collusion on the part of the liquor dealers of the nation and States, and some leaders of both the Democratic and Republican parties, and it has been this collusion, with the graft and other corruptions that have followed, perhaps more than any other one thing, that has provoked the good people in so many parts of the Union to abolish the saloon. Some politicians, who are themselves correct in their habits and whose convictions on the liquor question are in harmony with the church people generally, have been very shy or modest, to say the least, in publicly proclaiming themselves against the tyranny and lawlessness of the American saloon. Fortunately, many public men have all the moral courage that could be desired. As the saloon has been driven from one-half of the population of the country, and from most of the Southern States, there ought to be little political danger in leaders of either party declaring themselves openly against the crime-breeding and law-defying saloon. Moses, inculcating righteousness, set forth the clean and the unclean in food, utensils, etc., forbidding most positively the slightest contact with anything that was unclean; and we have here a type of the care which our representatives, from the lowest to the highest, should take in avoiding contact with political corruption of any kind, and especially the saloon, the source of every moral evil.

Every one that toucheth them shall be unclean. (Lev. 11 : 26.)

Statue to Lincoln Substitute

Mr. Palmer, a Democratic representative of Pennsylvania, has just introduced a bill into the United States Congress, appropriating $20,000 for the erection of a statue in honor of J. S. Staples, of Stroudsburg, Pa. At the head of the grave that holds the dust of Staples in the burying ground at Stroudsburg is a small tablet, bearing this inscription: "Here lies the body of J. Summerfield Staples, representative recruit of Abraham Lincoln." In 1863, when the issues were in the balance, it was decided by President Lincoln and his cabinet that they should send personal substitutes to the front as an example to the country. Lincoln directed his Adjutant-General to choose for him, as his substitute, as nearly a perfect man, physically and morally, as could be found. The Adjutant-General saw Staples, then a young man 18 years of age, on the streets of Washington, who answered Lincoln's description. He told him the desire of the President, took him to the White House to meet Mr. Lincoln, and the young man enlisted in the Second District of Columbia Volunteers, and served faithfully till the close of the war. Staples returned home after an honorable service. Many substitutes in the same war died in behalf of those for whom they went. Jesus went as our substitute, and perished in the conflict in our behalf. He died that we might live and enjoy the blessings of this life and of the life which is to come.

He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things? (Rom. 8 : 32.)

A Friend's Beautiful Tribute

At a memorial service held in the Brick Presbyterian Church, New York City, the other Sunday evening, for the Rev. Dr. William R. Richards, the late pastor, the Rev. Dr. Henry Stimson, pastor of the Manhattan Congregational Church of New York, a life-long friend of the deceased clergyman, made an address from which we quote a few sentiments, which will awaken deep interest and prompt high aspiration. They are as follows:

"When I think of our brother as I first knew him in his New England home, in the company of his mother and sisters, I think of him as an old-fashioned Christian. Brought up in the atmosphere of a country parsonage, surrounded with gentle faces and quiet voices, in an atmosphere of love and purity, and steadfast devotion to the welfare of others, where prayer was constant and faith was simple and satisfying, and life was well ordered as in the fear of God, he began his career with that preparation which went far in making him the man he was.

"When I think of him as he was in college, and in the seminary, it is of a beautiful youth, a fine scholar, a leader of men; but gentle, kindly, self-composed, and one of the best loved men of his class.

"As we have known him of late, older and burdened with the care and the responsibilities of a great city parish, there was the same reserved strength, the same self-control, with the ripening judgment and the increasing force of the same self-forgetful personality. Beneath all was the humorous, playful spirit, which found its opportunity for expression in the intimate companionship of his friends. He was a gift of God to this great church, and to the community, whose value can hardly be expressed."

The brotherhood of the ministry, illustrated in this tribute of a friend, is expressed by the apostle in his reference to a dear ministerial companion in these words:

Who is a beloved brother and a faithful minister and fellow-servant in the Lord. (Col. 4 : 7.)

Questions and Answers

Writers forwarding MSS. to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should enclose stamped envelopes for return of same, if unavailable.

A. S. McM., Geneva, N. Y. When was the Chautauqua Institution founded, and by whom?

The Chautauqua Assembly, now the Chautauqua Institution, was founded in 1874, by Lewis Miller and John H. Vincent.

E. K. L., Topeka, Kan. Where will the next great World's Fair be held?

A Universal and International Exhibition will be held in Brussels, Belgium, this year, opening in April. It will continue six months. It will have sections for art, science, industry, commerce and colonies. For two months there will also be an American Exposition in Berlin, in May and June, to show the world what is manufactured in the United States. There will also be a large exposition in Buenos Ayres, Argentina, opening in November. Next year there will be one in Turin, Italy.

R. G. H., Freeport, L. I. 1. How many United States mints are there, and where are they situated? 2. Is there any large country without a national debt?

1. There are five mints: At Philadelphia, San Francisco, Denver, New Orleans and Carson City. The last is equipped as an assay office. 2. Not that we know of.

J. E. S., Calhoun, Va. When will the millennium begin?

There are many ways of interpreting the book of Revelation, and many differences of opinion regarding the time of the beginning of the millennium. The truth is, that no one can fix, even approximately, the time. The proper Christian attitude is to be earnest, consecrated and vigilant, always watching and praying, so that at whatever date the prophecies are fulfilled we may be found ready.

M. A. L., Newton, N. C. How did St. Paul become a Roman citizen?

He himself stated that he was free born, i. e., inherited the rights of citizenship, which had probably been earned by some of his ancestors for services rendered to the Roman State.

O. T. B., Palermo, Me. Under what conditions did Henry Frances Lyte write the hymn, "Jesus, I my cross have taken"?

When Henry F. Lyte took orders, he did not seem to understand the Gospel he preached. His heart was not in the work. In 1818 a brother clergyman was dying, and Lyte visited him. Together they took up the study of the Scriptures, and it was in the course of that study that he experienced a change of heart and life. It was in the inspiration of that change that Lyte wrote the hymn.

Mrs. J. R., Waldoboro, Me. Who was the lad, and what was his name, who had the five barley loaves and the two fishes?

Tradition states that he was Ben Ezra, the son of Mariame, sister of Philip, one of the twelve. It is added that the boy afterward became a bishop. There is no authentic corroboration of the name in the work of any reliable writer.

E. S., West Liberty, O. 1. When, where, and in what way did the apostle Paul meet his death? 2. Who wrote the book of Revelations?

1. He was beheaded in Rome, by the tyrant Nero. 2. Believed to have been written by John, the apostle and evangelist, in Ephesus, immediately after his return from exile in Patmos.

J. D., Windsor, Canada. This is probably the cheapest place to live in to-day on the American continent. Butter is 28c., eggs 34c., milk 7c., beef 6½c. up, chickens 11c., mess pork 15c., lard 11c. In view of the present high cost of living, I would like to know if any town of its size can beat it?

The figures given are from 20 to 30 per cent. lower than most. Some of our readers in American towns may be interested in comparing these figures with those they are now paying.

Penitent, Germantown, Pa. Is it true that one may be guilty of the unpardonable sin without knowing it?

There is a great deal of loose teaching about the unpardonable sin. There are three degrees which lead to it, which may be stated briefly: (1) The complete rejection of God's love and his offer of forgiveness to the repentant sinner; (2) the total rejection of Christ as a loving Saviour, who died for us; (3) the final rejection of the Holy Spirit, which pleads and strives with us, even to the last extremity. The last rejection, obviously, would close the door to repentance; and the heart of the sinner, when that point is reached, would be utterly indifferent to the divine influence. But as long as the Spirit strives and pleads, as long as man's own heart and conscience reproach him and urge him toward God and a better life, as long as he feels the slightest degree of self-crimination or is troubled and anxious, he may be sure the Spirit is still at work and that there is still hope for him, if he will repent and take refuge in the abundant mercy of pardoning God.

E. G. Ollon, Suisse. I am reading a work where I find several references to the book of Enoch (Le livre d'Henoch). I should very much like to know where it is to be found, as it is not in the Apocryphas.

The book of Enoch was one of the most important remains of early Apocalyptic literature. It is referred to in Jude (verses 14 and 15) which is the first trace of its existence. Several of the early fathers mention Enoch as the author of prophetic writings. This book seems to have been known to Justin, Anatolius, Clement, Origen, Augustine, and others. A eighth century writer, Syncellus, makes what purport to be extracts from it. Three copies of the book of Enoch, in Ethiopic, were brought from Abyssinia in 1773. Its proper place in the consecrated collection was believed to be immediately before the book of Job. Several translations have been published, the best being by Lawrence, Hoffman, and Dilman.

L. D. B., Sergeantsville, N. J. Does Eph. 5:4 mean that all jesting is wrong? Or does it simply have reference to unclean jesting? What is meant by "idle words" (see Matt. 12:36)?

The general sense of the passage shows that the writer did not mean to proscribe innocent mirth and enjoyment, but profane and indecent jesting. The Greek adjective used was meant particularly to apply to the refined badinage and persiflage for which Ephesus was noted at that time, in which humor was cleverly employed without principle and for improper purposes.

C. O. B., Troutdale, Ore. Please explain Ezek. 18:4, 5.

It means that God as Creator is also the disposer of all things, and, being Creator of all alike, can have no reason but the principle of equity (according to men's works) to make any difference, so as to punish some and save others. "The soul that sinneth," and repents not, is alone is to bear the punishment, and not the innocent also.

Famous Christian Testimonies

Gov. Charles S. Deneen

HON. CHARLES SAMUEL DENEEN, Governor of Illinois, is a man whose experience in public affairs has been a long and varied one. He has been successively editor, teacher, lawyer, representative, State attorney, and now, as governor of a great Western State, he is eminently qualified to answer the question which some time ago was put to a number of leading Americans:

"Is the spirit of Jesus more dominant in business and public affairs than when you entered active life, and is it an advantage or not for a public man to-day to be known as a professing Christian?"

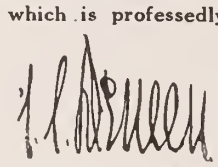
Below is Governor Deneen's answer, which is so clear, straightforward and confident that it calls for no comment at our hands. His letter adds one more to the list of governors of our great States who are men of earnest Christian life, and who possess the courage to "show their colors" when occasion demands.

STATE OF ILLINOIS
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT
SPRINGFIELD

Dear Sir: December 17, 1909.

You ask me briefly to answer the question, "Is the spirit of Jesus more dominant in politics and business and international affairs than when you entered active life?"

I think that nothing could be surer than that the spirit of Christianity is steadily growing in the world. The greater range and beneficence of the world's work of charity, both public and private, is one of the evidences of this. And this evidence is by no means confined to work which is professedly charitable, but is found also in the general attitude and laws of society which deal with human frailty and delinquency. The old sternness and severity are giving place to a milder and nobler spirit, and one more dominated by the greatest of the Christian virtues.



Governor of Illinois.

EVERY SUBSCRIBER A CO-EDITOR

DO you read the advertisements in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD? Are you aware that the statements made in them are as carefully edited as the editorial columns themselves? Wouldn't you like to help us keep them as clean and as wholesome as the rest of the magazine by calling attention to any discrepancy that may have escaped us?

We insist that every firm advertising with us shall be reliable; that every advertisement shall contain no promise that cannot be fulfilled. But in spite of our utmost vigilance exaggerated statements sometimes creep in.

For instance, we published a short time ago an advertisement which seemed to state that by using a certain machine you could make a pound of butter from a pint of milk. But when you analyzed it you found that you "merged" a pound of butter with a pint of milk and produced a substance (merged butter) that weighed two pounds. We of the city did not know what every one of our country subscribers would know at once, that the endeavor of the good butter-maker is to extract every last particle of milk from the butter, not to put it in. Again, we accepted a poultry advertisement that promised the most ridiculous profits from keeping a few hens.

When, again, our ignorance of the potential capacities of the farmyard allowed us to print what every farmer must have recognized as a preposterous statement, we received, literally, hundreds of protests, and were the more mortified because we knew that for every reader who protested openly there must be ten who remained silent.

Such a course long pursued, even though ignorantly and innocently, could not be other than harmful to the good feeling that now exists between our subscribers and our advertisers. And so, dear reader, we determined to ask you to help us hereafter in editing the advertising pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD; to tell us, or to tell the advertiser direct, if you prefer, what you think of his wares; to protest when you think it necessary, and at least to call our attention to any evidence of extravagant claims or of unfair dealing on the part of any of our advertisers.

In return, we will make you the following guarantee:

Whenever any of our subscribers is deliberately defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within one month of the date of the purchase.

Miscellaneous

Mrs. E. C., Albia, Ia. We cannot undertake to purchase for you.

C. P. D., Buda, Ill. Your scheme is ingenious, but, we fear, quite impracticable.

Mrs. E. C., Hanover, Ill. We have no means of knowing. Very seldom hear of him nowadays.

G. B. F., Jersey City, N. J. Write to the American Consul-General, Henry H. Morgan, Amsterdam, Holland.

H. S., Tennessee Ridge, Tenn. You can order books on prophecy through the Macmillan Company or Revell Company, publishers, New York.

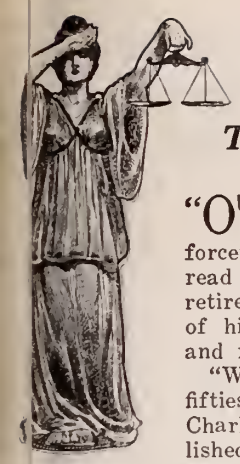
P. C. H., New Bedford, Mass., writes that the late Henry Rogers left $1,000,000 to the town of Fairhaven for a high school; not $100,000, as was reported. The building alone cost $780,000.

G. McG., Dahlonega, Ga. If their "gift" is of God, it will stand and will accomplish the work for which he gave it; if not of God, it will pass away. When he has a message to men, it is never unintelligible to those for whom it is meant. If it is intelligible to none, however, its genuineness is extremely doubtful.

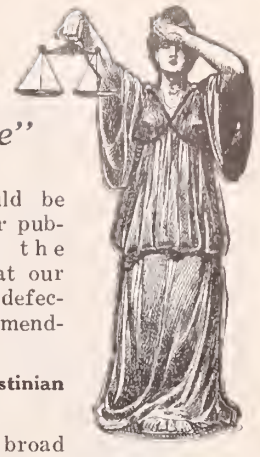
E. S., Piqua, O. 1. A house for social, benevolent and other work connected with the church. 2. The games you mention are in no sense a part of church work, nor do they tend to the spiritual or material growth of the people. There are many who hold the opposite view, but we believe the Church of Christ has a distinct mission and should keep to it.

Rev. W. Lomax Childress, Jennings, La., writes: "In THE CHRISTIAN HERALD issue of February 9, 1910, on page 138, appears a poem entitled "Kindness." I am the author of this poem. It originally appeared in the Religious Telescope, and I have since included it in a book of verse entitled The Bloom of the Berry. Your paper has been a welcome visitor in our home for many years, and has been an inspiration and a blessing to our hearts."

M., Washington, D. C. 1. Princeton and Union, we believe, are mainly orthodox and teach the essentials of the Christian religion. 2. No: Darwinianism has largely gone out of date. 3. We have repeatedly explained that the Bible itself fixes no date for the creation. It simply says: "In the beginning." The marginal dates are computations by Archbishop Ussher, and are of comparatively modern date. They are not a part of the Bible.



Evils of Our Legal System



The Second Article of the Series on "Our Country, Its Laws and Its People"

By E. R. JOHNSTONE

"OUR laws are too numerous, too conflicting, and their enforcement too tardy." When I read these words to my friend, a retired judge, he tapped the end of his nose with his eyeglasses and ruminated.

"When I was a youth, in the fifties," he said, "Bleak House, by Charles Dickens, was being published as a serial in Harper's New Monthly Magazine. Dear me! It is well on to two generations ago, but the memory is vivid of how the story took hold upon me and how long the periods between chapters seemed. What has Bleak House to do with 'the law's delay' and complexity? Why, don't you remember Snagsby, poor Miss Flite, and the case of Jarndyce and Jarndyce, with its 'judgment in the day of judgment'? Dickens wrote that novel to call attention to the criminal delays in chancery practice in the England of his day. The book did good, and it might be read to advantage by American legislators and lawyers nowadays.

'In the days before the Wilderness," continued the judge, thoughtfully, "I was a soldier and, as an orderly, saw a court-martial in a capital case. I have never forgotten the deep impression the proceedings made upon me for their dignity, fairness, and speed without haste. I can well understand the soldier's suggestion, 'If I'm innocent, try me by court-martial; if guilty, by a civil court.'

'In all my later years of practice at the bar and adjudicature on the bench," concluded the venerable jurist (he despises publicity, and I would not dare give his name), "I have been more and more convinced that America lags behind other great powers in respect to the clearness of its laws and the speed of their enforcement. This is true whether one refers to the civil or the criminal branches of my profession."

Our Law's Fountains

The fountain and origin of American law, so far as the present republic is concerned, is the Constitution of the United States. This must be so, since "unconstitutionality" makes void any statute. The machinery for law-making, however, occupies a much lower base, and this accounts for a great deal of undesirable output.

We have laws from State Legislatures whose recorded statutes, in each commonwealth, fill vast volumes, while the volumes fill shelves ten to twenty times the length of Dr. Eliot's much-mooted "five feet of books."

Then we have the ordinances from city councils and town boards which affect particularly the police powers of the city, town or village, their sanitation and health, and the public service corporations that give light, power and transport to our thousands of communities.

Congress, of course, is the greatest geyser for laws, and bad as are many of the statutes with which State Legislatures cumber their records, it is believed by high authorities that they are less evil in tenor and effect than the ill-considered, selfish or partisan enactments that each Congress spreads upon the Federal compendiums of what we must, or must not, do in this land of freedom, equality and justice.

Confusing Amendments

If evidence other than their enforcement were needed to show how badly adapted and how confused are many of our statutes, State and Federal, it would appear in the host of amendments to laws of record that are offered and passed in each session of Congress or Legislature.

A personal experience may be of interest. I thought it would profit to show how many laws affecting persons and property had been passed in a single State of the Union within the decade 1895-1904, inclusive. Wisconsin was selected, for no special reason save that the statutes for that State chanced to be available, and the task begun. Three days of as dry reading as could be found in all the realm of printed matter made me a laughing-stock to myself. I had found 122 such laws, but a vast and unexplored desert stretched ahead. To determine the real novelty of each enactment meant reference and cross-reference, search and research through a dozen or more volumes of from 900 to 1,200 pages. The majority were "acts to amend acts," and these again reduplicated into "an act to amend an act to amend an act entitled," etc., etc.

W. L. Breckinridge — Gen. Lewis Cass — Joseph D. Story

When I bethought me that here was only one State in forty-six and that but one decade was being considered, while some of the legal grist-mills had been grinding for more than a hundred years, the futility of the task appeared.

Greater difficulties have confronted other searchers after legal statistics, which may account for the lack of illuminating figures as to such things as these:

How many mistrials, civil and criminal, are there in the United States each year?

How many laws are yearly added to the vast list that now doth hedge about the citizen?

How much money is uselessly spent by clients and by courts in each twelve-month of our national life?

How many laws are passed that are never enforced because to do so would be impossible or unjust?

How many criminal cases have been "appealed" out of existence?

How many offenders against plain, prohibitive laws have escaped through technical flaws in indictment or trials?

The questions—that could be multiplied by any lawyer or publicist — themselves suggest the truth of the contention that our system of legal procedure is defective and in crying need of amendment.

Anglo-Saxon Law and the Justinian Code

The basis of all law, the broad distinction between the right and the wrong, is found in the Bible. Moses was a lawgiver for to-day as well as for the times of the Hebrew Exodus. In the Pentateuch rules of conduct are laid down that govern to-day as they did when Sinai flamed. The "thou shalt nots" of the Decalogue can suffer no safe amendment in the twentieth century. The law of God is the law of man, and this whether the makers of the latter recognize the omnipotence of Jehovah or not.

Doubtless the most famous compilation of ancient times is known as the Justinian Code, prepared at the behest of the Emperor Justinian, who reigned in Rome from A.D. 527 to 565. In a broad sense, this great code, cited as "the most important of all monuments of jurisdiction," has formed the foundation of modern law as it obtains in all the Latin-Union countries, and in portions of Germany.

From the Justinian, in great measure, came the French Code Napoleon, which is still the ruling spirit of French law, and some of the features of which have been adopted in many lands, notably in the South American States.

In Germany, Bismarck achieved a great work in 1870-78, when legal reforms were instituted that grouped into clear understanding the statutes of forty-six States, did away with divergencies and anomalies, and prescribed a system of practice that has been found effective and, in the main, admirable. The old German common law was founded on the Justinian Code, but each State had clouded and hampered justice by many enactments, which were done away with, made clear or modified. The law of Germany to-day much resembles the Code Napoleon.

The law of England—and it must be recognized that in the limits of such a presentation as this only the broadest statements can find room—is the growth of centuries of practical government by the people. It recognizes the jury system to the full, and assures rights to the person not given outside of Anglo-Saxondom. From the common law of England come our own plan and practice of law. It has been said that the great distinction between the Justinian Code and the Anglo-Saxon common law (our own, as it is England's) lies in this: In the Justinian Code the government is everything, the individual nothing. In our law the individual is everything, the government nothing. Naturally, this is too broad a statement; but it has enough of truth to illustrate differences of procedure between the United States and Great Britain and that in other great powers.

Which is the best method? Which makes most for justice?

Upon these questions men differ, as they do upon all vital questions. Certainly neither England nor the United States is ready to give up trial by jury, nor to change the presumption in favor of innocence of the accused to that of guilty. In the first half of the reign of Victoria many changes were enacted as to jurisdiction, appeals and general methods of pleadings in the English courts, and it is confessed by some of the greatest jurists this country has that the laws of Great Britain to-day are simpler,

There are rocks of doubt before me
As I onward go,
And the billows oft my fragile bark assail;
But no danger will I fear,
Tho' they may be hidden near,
For my Pilot at the helm can never fail.

Oft the tempest, wildly beating,
Fills my heart with fear,
As I seek to gain the harbor bright and fair;
But there comes to me sweet peace,
All my doubt and fear shall cease,
For I know my Pilot guides me safely there.

Storms may gather darkly round me,
And the tempest rage,
And the beacon lights along the shore be dim;
Yet my heart will not dismay,
I will wait the dawning day;
While my Pilot's at the helm I'll trust in Him.

For baby's bath, there is nothing quite so good as Ivory Soap.

Made of pure vegetable oils and containing no "free" alkali, it will cleanse, but it will not harm, the most delicate skin.

Most women know this. They use ordinary soaps for ordinary purposes. But, for the bath, toilet and nursery, where purity is all-important, their preference is for Ivory.

A VOYAGE OF LIFE

By Rev. A. F. Schauffler, D. D.

T the Hudson-Fulton celebration, recently held in New York, there as a great naval parade, and as the ng line of steamers went up the river any exclaimed, "There go the ships!" ow, there are many analogies be- reen ships and men. Poets have long id that man was like a ship, voyag- g across the ocean of life to an un- own port on the other side. Taking, en, these analogies, let us see what e can learn to our own profit.

Every ship has a cargo, or if no rgo it is seeking for cargo. Some rgoes are safe and some dangerous. olden time they used to load grain bulk, which was dangerous, for if e grain shifted in a storm it was apt throw the ship on her beam ends. otton is a dangerous cargo, and many eamship lines advertise, "These ships rry no cotton." Some years ago, an il-minded man tried to ship an in- rnal machine on one of the steamers a transatlantic line. His intention as that the clockwork in the machine ould go off while the ship was in mid- ean, and blow her to pieces. Fortu- tely, the clockwork went off while e infernal machine was on the dock. blew off the stern of the steamer and led thirteen men. Surely that would ve been a dangerous cargo to carry. st so every man carries a cargo. By is I mean a cargo of opinions, pas- ons, appetites, and these are sure to eck any young man who carries them. Years ago, in my Sunday School, a ung fellow came to me and said: "I ve come to the conclusion that there no God, no future life, no heaven and hell. When you are dead, you are ad, and that is the end of you." My ply was: "My dear fellow, these inions will wreck you before you get rough." Before long, he left the nday School, and I saw no more of n for years. Then one evening a ock came at my study door, and be- ld! the young man appeared. He as much run down, was blear-eyed d bloated. "Is that you, Fred?" said "Yes," he replied. "Is it drink?" id I. "Yes," he replied again. "Do u remember that I told you your inions would wreck you before you t through?"

All these appetites and passions ust be held in absolute control, and ne can help us to do this excepting mighty God, and the aid of his Holy irit.

A ship in the water is good, but ater in the ship is bad. A transat- ntic liner, years ago, owing to some fect in one of its pumps, began to mp water into the ship instead of mping it out. As they thought the ip had sprung a leak, they pumped the harder, with the result that the ip only filled the faster. Presently e water rose so that their fires were tinguished. Then, thinking that ey were going to the bottom, they andoned the ship. Later on, some nglishmen found her tossing in mid- ean, water-logged. Going on board. ey ascertained the trouble, pumped r out, brought her in and secured 00,000 salvage money.

Just so the Christian in the world is od, but the world in the Christian bad. The believer who allows the il practices of the sinful world to minate his heart cannot possibly cceed; and yet there are men who, e those in the ship above mentioned, em to pump the world into them- lves as fast as they can. These are en who indulge in drink, in lust, in il stories and in evil of every kind. ut the world out of your heart, unless u expect to be water-logged at the st and go down hopelessly in mid- ean!

Every ship has an anchor, and there e times when the safety of the ship pends on its right use of its anchors. When I was a boy in Constantinople, an American captain visited our house. He told us that his ship was anchored in an exposed harbor in one of the islands of the Ægean, when a violent storm broke upon them. Both of the anchors which they had down began to drag, and it was only a question of time when they would be cast ashore. They had one little anchor still unused, and though they did not hope much good could come from dropping it they took the chance. To their great surprise and equal delight, though the two larger anchors would not hold, the smaller one held, and they rode out the storm in safety. When they came to weigh the anchors, the two large ones came up easily, but the smaller one came with great difficulty. When at last it appeared above the surface of the water, lo and behold, the fluke of the anchor had caught in the ring of a large man-of-war's anchor that had been lost there long before! The man-of-war's anchor had been embedded in the soil, and this accounted for the fact that the little anchor held.

Every man voyaging on the ocean of life ought to have an anchor. The apostle speaks about a good hope, which he says we have as an anchor sure and steadfast entering into the unseen, which is within the veil. By this I mean a good hope in Jesus Christ as our Redeemer. That hope will save young men from being cast on the rocks, and blessed it is for us if we have this divinely forged anchor and use it for our safety.

Every ship has a compass. No captain would dream of going to sea without a compass, for there are times when neither sun nor stars appear and steering must be done by the compass alone. So every man should have a compass. God has given to us just this in placing the Bible in our hands. The Bible is the Christian mariner's compass, and by it he must steer.

Every ship has a captain. Some captains are good, some bad. Years ago, I went by steamer from Quebec through the lower St. Lawrence and around the Dominion coast. Our captain was under the influence of liquor the whole way, and you can easily imagine that I was glad to get ashore safely. One of the ocean steamship lines once dismissed a captain who, though thoroughly capable when he was sober, was given to drink. Another ocean line took him up, hoping that he had reformed. Unfortunately, this was not the case. Bringing his steamer across the Atlantic, and being under the influence of drink, he ran her too far north and on a winter's night rushed his steamer on to the rocks. That night 532 people found a watery grave. Surely that is not the kind of captain with whom we would ever care to sail. On the other hand, there was in my earlier days a captain of the Cunard Steamship Company—Captain Cook by name—careful, capable, endlessly vigilant. The passengers felt safe while he was on the bridge.

Just so, every one has a captain. Some one has charge of you in all your life's voyage, and either you are under the command of Jesus Christ as Captain of your salvation, or under the command of Satan, the captain of ruin and death and despair. Who is it today who is your captain? Satan has ruined every man who put himself under his charge, from the days of Cain down to these latest days in 1910. On the other hand, Jesus has brought every man safely through who puts himself under his care. Let him direct you, and be perfectly sure that at last he will bring you past iceberg and reef, through fog and storm, and land you safely in the port of eternal rest and joy.

The Strawberry Handkerchief

A Tale of Colonial Days in Old New York

By AMELIA E. BARR

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

FOR the benefit of our new subscribers we give a brief synopsis of the preceding chapters of Mrs. Amelia E. Barr's most interesting story: The scene is laid in New York, at the time of the Stamp Act, in 1765. Captain Jansen Van Vroom was a rich, retired sea captain, and lives with his wife Katrina in a fine Dutch house, by the North River. They have a daughter, Virginia, whom they wish to marry to a young sea captain, Batavius De Vries, for whom she has little liking. She is really in love with Joris Artaveldt, a dashing young officer. Virginia's dearest friend is Lady Rose Harley. Captain Van Vroom is bitter against the enforcement of the Stamp Act. Joris and the two girls dine at the captain's house, after which the two men leave. Arent Van Vroom, the son of the house, appears and is introduced to Lady Rose. The next morning Van Vroom describes the condition of New York to his son, and the things which were leading to the breaking point. The Lady Rose becomes interested in Arent when he describes his voyages. Joris declares his love for Virginia, and she returns his affection. Arent, her brother, falls in love with Lady Rose, who gives Virginia a handkerchief embroidered with strawberries. She herself has one like it. Virginia gives Joris the handkerchief. Politically, things grow worse. The people determine to resist the oppression of the British government, and wear only home-made things. Batavius De Vries suddenly returns, expecting to marry Virginia. He is a coarse, bombastic person, and Lady Rose is disgusted with the idea of Virginia marrying him. Joris tells his father of his love for Virginia and he offers no objection. Lady Rose plans to get Batavius drafted into the naval service. Virginia protests to her father against marrying Batavius. He angrily insists. He says the banns must be published within the month, and threatens her. The mother also takes the father's part. Joris tells Van Vroom he loves his daughter and is ordered away. Katherine Van Heemskerk offers to carry Joris' letter to Virginia. Batavius, walking back with Katherine, insults Joris, who lays his hand on his sword, but refrains from action for the lady's sake. She goes to Joris' side. Batavius, at Van Vroom's, jeers at the idea of Joris' gallantry. Virginia thrills with pride and praises Katherine. Arent Van Vroom returns bringing sixteen Southern patriots, including Aiken of South Carolina and Worth of Maryland. Batavius joined in with the rest and then said "Humbug," when out of hearing. The first Colonial Congress opens in New York. Batavius becomes anxious to have Virginia admire him, takes care with his dress and receives Van Vroom's approval. He tells Batavius to tell Virginia she will be betrothed to him on the twenty-eighth of that month. Batavius finds her in her kitchen. He tells her. She says, "Never!" He threatens and raises his arm as if to strike. He breaks a ring in which he had superstitious confidence. He goes for Van Vroom who is more interested in the opening of Congress.

THE deputation seeking the Governor's aid had failed. In curt and angry words Colden answered their request. "Your Congress," he said, "is unconstitutional, unprecedented, and unlawful, and I shall give you no countenance;" then turning to an officer, he gave an order about the strengthening of the fortifications, and the reception of the stamps. No one, however, had expected anything favorable to the Colonial Congress from Lieutenant-Governor Colden, and his foreseen refusal did not for one hour embarrass the proceedings of its members. They went to work immediately, amid an enthusiasm which neither civic nor military power could curtail or control.

Of course its demonstrations were offensive to many, and to none more so than to Batavius De Vries. After leaving the Captain he wished only to reach his ship, and the solitude he desired, as quietly and quickly as possible, but a provoking fate threw him in the way of one party of shouting, singing enthusiasts after another. Some invited, some commanded him to join them; some jeered at his fine clothing, some asked for his political opinions.

But at length The Arms of Stuyvesant sheltered him, and he locked himself in his cabin and sat down to take his bearings with regard to Virginia. He was determined to marry the girl, and, as he recalled her beauty, a restless fear of losing her came with the vision, and he resolved to go to the Van Vroom house and ask Madame for a cup of tea. Physically he needed it to expel the wicked spirit he had voluntarily called to obsess him, and there had also come to his consciousness in some way a belief that Virginia was deceiving all of them, and he determined to discover her plans and her assistants.

He found everything at Van Vroom's very quiet. The Captain was by the fireside, and Virginia playing a game of draughts with Harry Rutgers. Batavius placed himself where he could watch the game, and as Harry had never made any secret of his hopeless love for Virginia, he witnessed one of those pure, unselfish devotions which are spiritual triumphs. Harry indeed was well aware that his affection would never meet with any return, but his love was of that noble kind which can live for a woman without living with her. He knew of Virginia's engagement to Joris, and he knew also of her father's determination to marry her to Batavius—and he pitied the beautiful girl in this miserable dilemma.

Now that day Harry had received a letter from Lady Rose Harley. It was little more than a cover for one addressed to Virginia, and contained only a request that he would put the enclosure as quickly and quietly into Virginia's hand as he possibly could. "It is to let her know," she added, "that some affairs of great importance to my future life have gone favorably. The news will make her happy, and its transmission make me your obliged servant. ROSE HARLEY."

Virginia had this letter in her pocket, and as soon as the arrival of Batavius gave Madame something to do, and the Captain some one to talk with, she ran to her room and read the following lines:

"DARLING: The affair I came here to adjust has been settled in the most perfect manner. Everything is securely arranged. If your betrothal must take place before I return, let it; but remember you are not to be married till I can be your maid. I shall be in New York early in November, then you can hurry the wedding forward, if you will, as I am sure to go to England soon after I return. My dear Virginia, my unchangeable love salutes you. ROSE."

This letter, written with a care that precluded suspicion, if it should fall into other hands than Virginia's, gave the anxious girl great comfort. She felt able to face the intervening weeks, knowing that at the end of them there would be release. She resolved now to behave better to Batavius. It was only for a short time, and if she was moderately kind it would allay suspicion of her complicity in the final act of the Batavius affair.

She went back to the living-room a different Virginia. Her usual woman-slow step had the spring of girlhood in it, her eyes sparkled, her cheeks had the tint of the rose, she was smiling, and she drew her chair between her father and Harry with an air of cheerfulness. Batavius watched her with suspicion. He was sure she had some pleasant news, and he thought immediately of Joris. Harry and Joris were friends, and it was easy to leap from that fact to the supposition that Harry had brought Virginia a letter from Joris. Nothing but such a letter could have changed her so rapidly. He resolved to ask Harry to play him no underhand trick. For though Batavius trusted few men, and hardly believed in what they called "their honor," he knew, though he could not tell how he kew, that Harry Rutgers' words were te words, and his promise a thing t.t could never be broken.

Almost immediately Arent joined the company, and Harry went away. Then Captain Van Vroom surveyed his firese with satisfaction. He felt in such dnestic unity and closeness, Virginia nst learn to appreciate the husband hhad chosen for her. And Virginia's hppy mood seemed to justify this onion. She was full of sweet confinces with her brother and laughed al whispered, and when the pleased fher asked to share their mirth Virgia told him softly of some trick or cting witticism of the Liberty Boys, wch the Captain immediately repted to Batavius.

But Batavius was almost angry at tl second-hand participation, and he ske scornfully of those self-constited guardians of the city's liberty.

They are a mere mob," he said, "a vgar mob, whom men of my conditi and respectability despise. So insently they strut, and such airs of ste they put on, that a sensible man li Batavius De Vries has not even rdicule left for them—only an indescbable scorn."

Let me tell you, Batavius," answred Arent, "that the mob, as you ca The Boys, are the visible agents ofinvisible persons of the highest rak and character."

Then ashamed of themselves they ought to be, Arent. For my part I li things done orderly and decently. Sging and shouting about the goverment is improper. I do not appve of it. And pray, my Captain, w has this fine Congress of Colonies chsen for its Chairman?"

Timothy Ruggles, of Massachuses. I take leave to say, a good cice, Batavius."

I do not know him. Why did they nc select a New York man? John C ger, or Philip Livingston, or Leonar Lispenard——"

You have let something slip your mnory, Batavius," answered the Captn a little coldly. "New York did nc forget that she was the host, and th members her guests. Well, then, th host does not honor himself; he gis all honor to his guests. Ruggles si well in the chair. Many generatis will remember him for it."

Yet I heard, father," said Arent, "tt the first words Mr. Ruggles utted from the chair was a straight asrtion that resistance to the Stamp Ai was treason."

My son, for those words I give him prse. In plain Dutch he said to his asciates, 'By the law of England the thg we are going to do is high treaso We are taking our lives in our hds, and if there are any here presen not willing to give their lives for thfreedom of their country they had beer, right now, step out of line and gcide themselves.' No one did it!"

Who are the New York delegatis?" asked Batavius.

Robert and Philip Livingston, Jon Cruger, William Bayard and Lnard Lispenard."

I have known them all—a long tig I have known them. I have dc business with them, and I judge nc as you do, Captain. For the black brd of treason, they had an open stach these many years. Leonard Lispenard is living on the large grants wch George the Second gave to his w's family. I always saw the ungrteful rascal through one hundred fos."

You talk nonsense, Batavius. If a m gives you a loaf to-day, and tomorrow takes it back sixfold, gratitude is ot in the question. If George the Sond gave Lispenard's wife land, Gorge the Third is picking Lispenars pocket on every side."

"Well, well," laughed Batavius, "if men pick our pockets, we must be Christians and bear it. I bear no ill will to any man. I think of all men alike. I am just to the honest man, and just to the thief. But why indeed do men steal? To steal is a great foolishness, cheating is so easy and so much more safe and profitable. As for England——"

"She has ruined us all."

"Forgive her, then you will be forgiven."

"For bad ends, you use good words, Batavius. Forgive that I may be forgiven?"

"Come, come!" said Madame. "Very tired am I of this subject. We will sing the night hymn, and then give to ourselves a little sleep."

The next morning Virginia was aware of a slight feeling of pity for Batavius. She reminded herself of his old kindness to her, and of the sincere liking which her father and mother, and even Arent, had for the man; and she resolved to be as friendly as circumstances permitted her to be. But with this tolerance there was no slackness in her purpose to avoid marrying him. Batavius, however, was in no mood to accept any curtailment of what he considered his rights as an acknowledged lover; and the situation was so strained and unhappy Madame was glad when one morning, in a sulky mood, he removed himself to The Arms of Stuyvesant.

"I know not what to think of such love-making," she said to her husband, "and what happiness is to come of it, I see not. Batavius was more sulky this morning than was civil, and if he is pleasant, then Virginia is cross."

"It is the way of lovers."

"No, it is not the way. Also, there is something strange about Virginia. Too silent is she. Of her marriage she will not speak. As to her betrothal, she either laughs at it, or else she denies it."

"I will think about the matter. A day or two I will take to think it over. Between my daughter and my country I am full of trouble."

"My advice to thee is to think about thy daughter. There are men at the City Hall whose business it is to think about the country. Thou had best take a little time to find out what is wrong with Virginia. Very unhappy is she, and the house is sad and heavy with her tears and complaining. Jan, I tell thee truly, there is trouble in thy own house."

"What trouble?"

"In particular, I know not. That is for thee to find out."

"She ought to speak to her mother."

"She has spoken. It is ever the same complaint—'I will not marry Batavius. He makes me sick.'"

"Oh, then, I am tired of her foolishness."

Madame turned away with a dissatisfied air. She found all her attempts to rouse in her husband an adequate anxiety about Virginia's marriage met by the same confidence in his own authority and his daughter's submission to it. And Madame had lost faith in Virginia's unqualified obedience. She feared, if the marriage was brought to a certain pont, some flagrant violation of the rite, when it came to that point—either that Virginia would make some distressing scene, or deny her obligations, or perhaps even run away and hide herself.

Katrina had not much imagination, but on this subject her mind had vague and distressing fears.

The variation of Virginia's moods troubled and even alarmed her. She did not understand their changeableness, and she was depressed by her failure to comprehend her own child.

We Spend Unseen Thousands

Most hose, in the stores, look alike to you buyers, yet there's a vast difference among the different brands. Some are made with a "two-ply" yarn instead of the costlier "three." Some are knit in a haphazard way.

We are spending this year to produce Holeproof Hose four times what it costs to make common grades.

The fact that this difference doesn't show at a glance means that hundreds will still fail to get the best hose.

We are telling you of it so you'll know and can get them. You may as well, for these four-times-better hose cost you just the same as the others.

Where These Thousands Go

The yarn used in genuine "Holeproof" costs an average of 70 cents a pound—the top market price for cotton yarns. It is made from Egyptian and Sea Island cotton—the very finest cotton obtainable.

Sizes, Colors, Prices

Holeproof Sox—6 pairs, $1.50. Medium and light weight. Black, black with white feet, light and dark tan, navy blue, pearl gray, lavender, light blue, green, gun-metal and mode. Sizes, 9 to 12. Six pairs of a size and weight in a box. All one color or assorted, as desired.

Holeproof Sox (extra light weight)—6 pairs, $2.00. Mercerized. Same colors as above.

Holeproof Lustre-Sox—6 pairs, $3.00. Finished like silk. Extra light weight. Black, navy blue, light and dark tan, pearl gray, lavender, light blue, green, gun-metal, flesh color and mode. Sizes, 9 to 12.

Holeproof Full-Fashioned Sox—6 pairs, $3.00. Same colors and sizes as Lustre-Sox.

FAMOUS
Holeproof Hosiery
FOR MEN WOMEN AND CHILDREN

It is "Three-Ply"

Yarn of equal weight made from but two strands is stiff and coarse in comparison. We could save, if we used it, 30 cents a pound for extra profit. This is one of the things you don't see when you buy.

Our Expensive Process

Another is our 32 years of experience; and the result—the "Holeproof" process.

We spend $33,000.00 a year simply to see that each finished pair of hose is perfection.

All this means but one thing—that you get in "Holeproof" the very utmost in hosiery.

Then Look for "Holeproof" on the Toe

There are hose not nearly so good as "Holeproof" sold on the original "Holeproof" idea, but the only genuine "Holeproof"—the "three-ply"—"70c-yarn" hose, bear the name "Holeproof" on the toe of each pair and the trademark shown below. "Holeproof" means four-times-better-than-common hose. It means thousands of dollars spent for comfort and wear that don't show till you wear the hose.

So be sure that the hose you get are real "Holeproof." Don't take an inferior imitation with a name and trade-mark resembling ours. (36)

A POWER OVER SEA AND SOUL*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

BEFORE we enter on the actual study of the lesson it will be well to give a few brief explanations of the text. "Entered into a boat." The boat was probably not over twenty feet long. Such boats as one sees to-day on the Sea of Galilee, with shallow keels and a decked bow, with a mast in the centre.

"There arose a great tempest." The conditions for a tempest are a part of that region; the surface of the Sea of Galilee is at least 1,000 feet below the surrounding hills. On the northern border of the sea are the mountains of Lebanon and Hermon, from whose snowy peaks and sides there rush down icy winds, which sweep the sea and make their furious way through tunnels, as it were, formed by the hills which converge at the lower end.

"The boat was covered with waves." Because it was so shallow, and the thirteen men aboard represented the full capacity of the boat.

"But he was asleep." Undoubtedly in the little cabin at the bow, his head resting upon a sailor's wooden pillow. He was weary, for it had been a day of great service: preaching to the multitudes on the shore, from the boat as a pulpit. He had given his wonderful series of seven parables. When Jesus would sail away for rest, he had been hindered by three hangers-on, who were not altogether honest in their expressed determination to follow him. They detained him to answer their foolish objections.

"Save, Lord; we perish." This is the cry of terror with which the apostles awoke Jesus, when they thought their boat was about to be engulfed, and they with it.

"Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?" We seem to see the frightened men gathered about the door of the little cabin where Jesus was lying; the terror depicted on their faces being in strange contrast to the serene face of Jesus, with the gentle touches left upon it by kindly sleep. The reproof given them by Jesus was reassuring while it was severe. It was as if he said to them, "With me in the boat you should not have feared danger."

"Then he arose, and rebuked the winds and the sea." The words he spoke were, "Peace, be still," as one might command troublesome dogs to lie down. Immediately, like hounds, the waves were low at their feet.

"What manner of man is this, that even the winds and the sea obey him?" It had been their custom so to obey ever since their creation; indeed, their creation had been through their obedience.

"And when he was come to the other side." The eastern shore of Galilee, to the country of the Gergesenes, or Gadarenes, as the inhabitants were called, because the important city of Gadara gave the name to that region. Gadara was situated on a mountain over 1,200 feet high, and about six miles from the shore of the Sea of Galilee.

"Coming forth out of the tombs." Two men came to meet Jesus. They were not dead men resurrected, but fierce, very much alive demoniacs. They were two of many such unfortunate creatures, who had taken refuge in the caverns (tombs) in the sides of the hills that lay between the sea coast and the city of Gadara. These two were especially fierce, "so that no man could pass by that way," as fierce as wild animals. They cried out, "What have we to do with thee, thou Son of God?"

"A herd of swine feeding." According to Mark's Gospel, there were two thousand animals in the herd (Mark 5:13).

"Send us away into the herd of swine." This was the prayer of the devils to Jesus. They knew Jesus would not let them stay in humans.

"And he said unto them, Go." And taking an inside passage, the devils rode the swine to death—the death of the swine, not the death of the devils. The swine rushed down the steep hillside—a descent of forty feet—and were drowned in the sea. And the devils went about seeking another incarnation!

"And they that fed the swine fled." The swine-herders; perhaps they feared the devils would take possession of them! They fled to Gadara, and published in the streets what had happened.

"All the city came out to meet Jesus." His fame had reached the city before him, through the bereft swine-herds.

"They besought him that he would depart from their borders." They had no welcome for him. It would seem that there were yet more devils in Gadara to be cast out, and that the inhabitants preferred to keep the devils rather than to lose any more property. And Jesus passed by Gadara; but there was one Gadarene who begged to go with Jesus—one of the men he had delivered from the demons. But Jesus said, "No; but go home, and tell your friends what has been done for you." And he straightway became a preacher of righteousness, not only in his own home city, but in the ten cities in the region called Decapolis.

Is Jesus Casting Out Devils To-day?

There was a banker in the town of ———, who sat in his pew in the church every Sunday, but it must appear, as we tell a story about him, that he was not a Christian. His brother, a clergyman, said of him: "Joshua takes the position of a Christian toward the town, but in his own house he is an ordinary heathen." His sister was left a widow, with seven children and a small income. She proposed to her brother that he should take her son Alfred to educate, and afterward give him a place in the bank. The proposition did not meet with the approval of the aunt, and she said to her husband: "It is a pity such a nice boy should be spoiled." "I do not know what you mean by the boy being spoiled," he replied. What she did mean was that he would be spoiled by his uncle's un-Christian supervision of everything he was given to do. But it was decided to have Alfred come. In his first letter home he wrote how unhappy he was, and that he should never be able to love his uncle, and he wrote also that his aunt was very unhappy.

Alfred was too religious to please his uncle, who said one day, "I will kick him out of my house if he continues to refer everything in his life, and the lives of those connected with him, to the Bible and God." Fortunately, he did not do it at once. In the meantime, the aunt interested herself in his Bible study and joined him in his daily reading. One morning, as the aunt and nephew were reading together, they heard a terrified cry from the uncle, and they rushed to his room and found that he had had a paralytic stroke. For weeks he hovered between life and death, and could neither speak nor write out his wishes. But he often made a strange sound, always the same. At last they discovered that he was trying to speak the name of God. One morning Alfred put a pencil in his uncle's hand, saying, "Perhaps, uncle, you could write something that I could understand—even a word or

A GOOD CHANGE

A Change of Food Works Wonde

The wrong food and drink causes a trouble in this world. To change the is the first duty of every person that particularly from stomach and ne troubles. As an illustration: A lady i has, with her husband, been brought a to health again by leaving off coffee some articles of food that did not agree them. They began using Postum and G Nuts food. She says:

"For a number of years I suffered stomach and bowel trouble which kep ting worse until I was very ill most time. About four years ago I left off and began taking Postum. My stomach bowels improved right along, but I w reduced in flesh, and so nervous that the thing would overcome me.

"Then I changed my food and began Grape-Nuts in addition to Postum. I on these two principally for about months. Day by day I gained in flesh strength until now the nervous trouble entirely disappeared and I feel that I my life and health to Postum and G Nuts.

"Husband is 73 years old and he troubled, for a long time, with occas cramps, and slept badly. Finally I prev upon him to leave off coffee and take Po He had stood out for a long time, but he tried Postum for a few days he that he could sleep and that his cramp appeared. He was satisfied and has gone back to coffee.

"I have a brother in California wh been using Postum for several years whole family use it also because they had such good results from it."

Look in pkgs. for the little book, Road to Wellville." "There's a Reason

two—for I am sure you have wishes which you wish to make known. After several attempts he did write a few intelligible words: "Forgive me; don't leave me. Read your book to me; pray for me."

The sick room became a daily meeting place for Bible reading and prayer for the uncle, the aunt and the nephew. Health and strength came slowly back, the paralyzed tongue was unloosed, and the clouded brain grew clear; and then it was discovered that the uncle had indeed become a child of God. Jesus had cast out the devils of unbelief and censoriousness and ill-temper.

And Jesus is doing just this sort of thing every day among us, although he is not in the sight of men.

Lessons from the Sea

The sea is a vast mirror, that reflects not only the light of the moon and stars and sun, but it reflects heavenly truths to our minds and hearts. If we stand on the deck of a steamer in midocean, and look up, a voice within cries, "If I ascend into heaven, thou art there." If we look down into the waves, the voice cries, "If I descend into the deep, thou art there." If you look abroad over the unbroken expanse of waves, the voice says, "If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me" (Ps. 139:9). But the frightened apostles did not so look up and down and around. They did not even look as far as the little cabin on their boat, where lay their Saviour and Deliverer.

The Sea an Expression of God's Power

Far back in the chaos of the world's beginning, when darkness was upon the face of the deep, the Spirit of God brooded upon the waters, and at his word, "Let light be," light was. At his word again, "Let the waters be gathered together," they obediently separated into the upper ocean of clouds and the lower ocean of waves, parted only by the isthmus of air.

Not only the creation and the arrangement of the oceans, but also their continued boundaries, tell us of God's power. Swifter than lightning express, the earth moves in its orbit and on its axis, but yet the ocean does not overflow the land, as we might naturally expect, because God has said to it, "Hitherto shalt thou come, but no farther," and his mighty laws are set as a watch to see that the command is obeyed. Great is our God, "who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand" (Isa. 40:12). "He it is who shut up the sea with doors when it was born (Job 38:8). During a great storm at sea a little girl, not more than ten years old, was very calm. She was asked why she was not afraid. Her reply was: "Drowning is only sinking into the hollow of God's hand, and so there is nothing to make me afraid," and then she repeated the verse Isa. 40:12 and said she had learned it in Sunday School.

The Ocean Mirrors God's Justice

"Thy judgments are a great deep" (Ps. 36:6). Would you see the ocean in its revelations of God's justice? Then hear the rushing waters of the deluge as they sweep over the mountains, terrible as an army with banners, executing judgment for the Almighty.

Or look upon the clashing waters of the Red Sea, like an avenging army, mingling the noise of their waves with the tumult of the drowning people, as the host of Pharaoh perish in the depths of the sea. And to the accompaniment of the sound of many waters Miriam and the delivered people sing together: "The Lord hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he drowned in the depths of the sea." Years afterward, King David looked back to that deliverance of his fathers and cried, "If it had not been the Lord who was on our side, the waters had overwhelmed us."

Look also into the still, salt waters of the Dead Sea, with which God has buried the corrupt cities of the plain, and "the garden of the Lord," which they had blighted with their wickedness, and see that law of God reflected: "The soul that sinneth it shall die."

But amid all of the angry waters of judgment the saved soul has no fear, because of the Ark of Redemption, with which the Lord has shut him in.

The Ocean a Mirror of God's Love and Mercy

In Solomon's temple there was a great brazen sea for the cleansing of priests and worshipers. It stood upon twelve oxen, three looking toward the North, three toward the South, three toward the East, and three toward the West. To the Israelites it pictured the cleansing power of God's love and mercy. The apostle John saw God's mercy as a shoreless sea, and he exclaimed, "Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us!" That dying Christian woman saw it, and joyously in a whisper cried, "Oh the ocean! Oh the ocean! Oh the ocean of the love of God!"

Job saw that in order to keep the sea pure God stirred it to ceaseless activity, with storm and tempest. He perceived that the Almighty had set a watch upon it, to keep it in its proper place and prevent it from destructive wanderings. All of these restraints and storms were to Job the tokens of the sea's importance, and of God's constant care. Job, in his afflictions, recognized an overruling Providence, by which the assaults of the devil and annoying friends were made to work out his good. He felt that the storms and tempests must be designed to rouse and purify his nature, and that all his restraints were indications of the value God put upon a human soul and the care he exercised to keep it from evil. Even that great wind from the wilderness that came upon the house where Job's children were gathered, and smote the four corners of the house, so that it fell and destroyed them; even that fearful gale, by which Job's dearest hopes were wrecked, had its mission of mercy and blessing. Out of it Job came with his heart cleansed of self and filled with God.

The soul is pictured by the restlessness of the sea. Ruskin, looking at the sea, said: "How shall we follow its eternal changefulness of feeling? It is like trying to paint a soul." But in the troubled sea that could not rest the prophets saw a picture of an unsaved soul (Isa. 57:20). By nature every soul is as unrestful as the sea, having no abiding calm. But when the power of Jesus is felt there is "peace, sweet peace."

The Ocean of Our Immortality

It lies beneath and within the upper ocean of God's eternal care and love. What is death but a voyage like that of Columbus, from one world to a better one, which we have not seen, but have felt assured of in our souls!

How eagerly Columbus looked to the New World as his desired haven, and struggled through the jeers of the street and the ridicule of the schools, until he was at last successful, and saw through the shades of night, as he anxiously paced the deck of his vessel, the morning light which was his first assurance of having reached the New World. The morning showed him, in all its beauty, his land of promise. May we look toward the heavenly land with such faith and desire that, through the gathering shades of death, we may see the light of God's sure promises, and when the shadows lift behold the glory of the land that is fairer than day.

Patient Faithfulness*

"AH!" once said a brave painter to Emerson, "if a man has failed, it is because he has dreamed instead of working. There is no way to success in our art but to take off your coat, grind paint and work like a digger on the railroad, all day and every day.

"The way to learn German is to read the same dozen pages over and over a hundred times, till you know every word in them and can repeat them by heart. No genius can recite a ballad at first reading so well as mediocrity can at the fifteenth or twentieth reading. To have learned the use of tools by thousands of manipulations; to have learned the arts of reckoning by endless adding and dividing, is the power of the mechanic and the clerk.

"And well the primal pioneer
Knew the strong task to it assigned,
Patient through heaven's enormous year,
To build in matter home for mind.
From air the creeping centuries drew
The matted thicket low and wide;
This must the leaves of ages strew,
The granite slab to clothe and hide,
Ere wheat can wave its golden pride."

Thus our great poet-philosopher shows us by powerful figures the work of patience in producing great results.

It is especially necessary at this time to emphasize the need and beauty of this cardinal virtue. The age is swift and impatient. Telephones, telegraphs and automobiles annihilate time and space, and the aeroplane seems likely to quicken the pace still further.

Men are no longer willing to wait the slow processes which are necessary to great achievement, and which seem likely never to be superseded. "Art is long," and no royal road to profound learning or deep culture has ever been discovered. Line upon line, precept upon precept, forms character, and the growth must forever be slow.

In the moral world, it must be even slower. The soul comes not into its own by accident. The ways are long and winding and thorny. Infinite patience, utter faithfulness, are all that will convoy one to the end. A great one has said: "We aim at a swift and petty benefit, to such a sudden sweetness. We snatch at the slowest fruit in the whole garden of God, which many summers and winters must ripen." It is far harder to wait quietly than it would be to fight, to struggle, to do almost anything; but not seldom the passive waiting is set for us as a duty.

A physician had prepared a certain medicine and had caused to be printed on the bottle, "Shake hard for two minutes." The nurse in charge took the instruction literally, and shook the bottle two minutes by the clock once every hour before administering the dose.

One day she said to the doctor, "I find the hardest part of my duty the two-minute shaking of that medicine." "Oh," cried the doctor, "that direction is for the unfaithful ones. The faithful ones need give the bottle only a shaking like this"—and he shook it powerfully for less than half a minute.

The whole scheme of life seems sometimes to be designed in this same manner—for the unfaithful ones. All the great operations of nature and of art are calculated to develop and strengthen patience and faithfulness. We are shown that human nature is defective in these great virtues. Let us take up our burdens cheerfully. They are good for our souls.

Pain's furnace heat within me quivers;
God's breath upon the fire doth blow;
And all the heart within me shivers
And trembles in the fiery glow.
And yet I whisper, "As God will"
And in his fiercest fires hold still.

CAMPAIGNING IN NICARAGUA

lt artillery is reported to be commanded by a young Texan, who served fo a number of years in the militia o his native State and is now making gd use of the knowledge he there acqred. A large number of Europeans a also said to march in the insurgent rks. For the most part they are m who have invested all their small c ital in some agricultural enterprise, a who are fighting to save it. The p ers in charge at Managua have gwn to think of the property of foreiers as their legitimate prey, and it w the fact that Cannon and Groce we rich which caused the Zelayans tout them to death in order to get tr property. Recently, in a street q rrel, the man who bound their eyes bore they were shot killed in the stet the officer who commanded the fing party. Another official implicd in their murder has died redtly, from an unknown cause.

Chamorro gave up his position at Magalpa, evacuated the city in the nht, and escaped with his force. The gernment troops had planned to stm his position in the morning. It is eported at this writing that he is nking a dash on the capital, and tops are rushing to intercept him. If hgets into Managua the revolution w be over and Madriz driven out, as a Granada will rise to help the insgents.

So tragic and dramatic are the ents of this revolution that it is easy tsee why Central America and its inurrections have been a favorite time with popular story writers, and wy it has been the goal of soldiers of ftune from the day the first steeld adventurer landed on its shores to t present day. Power and authority a here ever to the strong; the weake party must carry the burdens, or bdriven into exile.

He Spent in Helping Women

THE death on February 3 of Miss Ella Doheny, chaplain and religus director of the Young Women's Cristian Association of the City of w York, has ended a career of unusl influence. Miss Doheny was a man of intellectual power, wide and ctivated reading, with a keen sense c humor and a peculiar sympathy th the joyous side of life. While a yng girl, she felt called to devote hr life to special work for young men. In 1872 she became librarian a l general secretary at the Associatn, and since 1888 has filled the positn of chaplain. Her chief care, perps, was the Bible class. Beginning i 1872 with six members, it had at te time of her death a registered mbership of about 1,200. The ited Workers, an organization with the Bible class membership, distbuted leaflets and tracts among ner young women whom they sought i stores and factories, and in the city lrks. Many of these girls have been ierested through the Summer School Recreation and Instruction, which o came under the chaplain's supersion.

Possibly Miss Doheny's influence s most widespread through her dership in the Travelers' Aid work. pplementing the help given by inted cards in waiting-rooms of ilroad stations and in the secondss cabins of ocean steamships, and special agents meeting girls and linging them to the Association, Miss heny never relaxed her vigilance in tching over the traveler or the vsr until safely at her destination, or a suitable position in the city. ny a mother in a far-away city or wn has been gladdened by the return a runaway daughter or by the news the safekeeping into which the girl had come, amidst the dangers and temptations of a strange city, through the loving watchfulness and wise counsel of this godly woman. For thirty-two years she was a protector, adviser, confidante and "best friend" to a countless multitude of young women. Probably no other woman has had so direct a personal influence upon the young women of the great city of New York.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELIST WILLIAM H. FRIDAY, JR., is conducting a series of meetings in the First Baptist Church of East Rochester, N. Y., the pastor of which is Rev. George B. Riegel.

—MRS. ANNA SHAW, the well-known suffrage leader, was suddenly stricken with illness at a meeting in New York, lately. Mrs. Shaw is a strenuous little woman and has undoubtedly been overtaxing her strength.

—FEBRUARY 5 was the seventy-third anniversary of the birth of D. L. Moody, and was observed as "Founder's Day" by the Northfield Seminary and Mount Hermon School. These schools, which began twenty-five years ago with a handful of students, now have an annual registration of over eight hundred, and turn away as many more for lack of room.

—MISS SASHA E. PERKIN, the writer whose interesting article on the women of Algeria appeared in the February 23 issue, is a daughter of the late Sir William Henry Perkin, who was honored throughout Europe and America with the degrees of Doctor of Science and LL.D. It was a notable occasion, several years ago, when President Butler, of Columbia College, New York, conferred these degrees. Harvard and Johns Hopkins followed, with the same honors. Sir William was considered one of the greatest scientists of his age. His daughter is associated with Miss Lillian Trotter in her mission to the Arabs. It is an independent mission, supported by faith exclusively.

—CANYON FALLS ACADEMY is the latest work of the Soul Winners' Society in the Kentucky Cumberlands. It owes its existence to a noble woman of Connecticut, who provided for its erection and furnishing. It was built last summer in a beautiful valley, among a poor but worthy people, who had no school for a multitude of bright lads and lassies. It is a handsome two-story house of seven rooms. A new chapel and schoolhouse have just been finished at the Ebenezer Mission of the Soul Winners, in the Great Smoky Mountains, on the border of North Carolina. The Highland College, on the Puncheon Camp, is now crowded to overflowing, where a few years ago there was neither a church nor school.

—THE TWO BEAUTIFUL and helpful verses below are from the pen of Rev. Howard Arnold Walter, a young American minister, now taking a supplementary course in Glasgow University. He was converted at Old Orchard, Me., and is a Congregational minister:

"I would be true, for there are those who trust me;
I would be pure, for there are those who care;
I would be strong, for there is much to suffer;
I would be brave, for there is much to dare.

"I would be friend of all—the foe, the friendless;
I would be giving, and forget the gift;
I would be humble, for I know my weakness;
I would look up, and laugh, and love, and lift."

—MISSIONARY W. HAGQVIST, of the Scandinavian Alliance Mission, in China, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: "We have three very excellent and devoted native workers, for whom we would be greatly pleased to have support, as they are thus far totally unprovided for. They are: Tsin-King, evangelist; Li Yu Chu, a teacher, and Tuan Ta Sao, a Bible woman. We are in great need of native helpers in the Japanese field also. There are four other very bright and gifted young men, who would be capable of rendering valuable work in that field. They are named Hoskimo, Majuma, Tanise and Kobayushi." Any readers of this journal wishing to undertake the support of one of these workers, as their personal representative and substitute, in China or Japan, can receive all the necessary information by writing to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Called Higher

Mrs. M. E. Throckmorton, of Mulvane, Kan., was called home July 21, 1909.

Miss Sarah E. Oakley, of Huntington, N. Y., died September 5, 1909, aged sixty-eight years. Asleep in Jesus.

Mrs. Katherine Wherfel, of Topeka, Kan., died October 4, 1909. She lived a consistent Christian life: a church, Sunday School and missionary worker.

Mrs. Harriett McConkey, of Basehor, Kan., died at her home December 2, 1909. She was a member of the Presbyterian Church. She lived a beautiful Christian life.

After an active and useful live of seventy-eight years Dr. J. W. Crawford, of Blandville, Ky., passed to his eternal home November 21, 1909. He was a consecrated Christian and a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many years.

Mrs. Antoinette L. Spencer, widow of the late Dr. C. D. Spencer, "fell on sleep" at her home in Binghamton, N. Y., on October 30, 1909, at the age of eighty-six years. In early life she connected herself with the Presbyterian Church, and for more than thirty years she was interested in every good work, particularly in the Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, and had been a member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family for many years. She was a faithful Christian, mother and friend.

Our Lookout Round the World

THE plan to make Peary a Rear-Admiral by act of Congress does not seem to make much progress. Our Secretary of the Navy has written a letter to Representative Foss of Illinois, pointing out that the explorer holds the rank of civil engineer, not commander, and that it seems inappropriate to confer upon him "a title for which his previous service and training have not fitted him." In other words, the Navy is against the proposition. However, Peary's exploits deserve recognition, and possibly an appropriation may be suggested, as is frequently done by foreign governments in recognition of distinguished scientific services. As the French Antarctic expedition, under the celebrated scientist, Dr. Charcot, has failed to reach the South Pole, that field of adventure still remains open, and Peary will now probably take advantage of it.

—THE country is not yet done talking about Mr. Fairbanks' rencontre with the Pope, in which the attitude of the Vatican against free speech and popular enlightenment was significantly emphasized. It is the misfortune of Italy that it has been suffering from both intellectual and spiritual neglect, and the Roman Church has done little to help the people in this respect. Premier Sonnino, who is a vigorous reformer, now proposes a remedy for the illiteracy of the country by establishing 40,000 schools, at a cost of $48,000,000, which he advises the State to lend to the municipalities. This educational reform will meet with a vigorous opposition, not only from the upper classes, but from the church, although its realization would be a great boon to the whole country.

—AND now Spain, in its turn, is facing an anti-clerical crisis, which close observers believe may lead to events similar to those in France before the separation of church and State. Señor Canalejas, the Premier, is a vigorous Liberal and favors the introduction of a broad system of public education as a national necessity. His programme has aroused the opposition of the church party, which is plotting for his downfall. The test must soon come, and it will show whether Spain is to make real progress or to submit to the domination of the Roman Church, which has always opposed popular education.

—MANY attempts have been made in late years to introduce "drawing features" in the Protestant churches here, to bring in bigger audiences. Some of these schemes have been merely ridiculous, and have met with deserved failure. A typical case of this kind is that of a so-called "men's church" in New Jersey, which provided moving pictures, vaudeville music and smoking facilities. After the novelty of the thing wore off the "men's church" ceased to be a drawing card and now it has gone out of business. Such is the fate that awaits all churches that go out of their true orbit and attempt unduly to mix the worldly with the spiritual. Such churches, or rather their pastors, have no true appreciation of the Gospel and its power to draw men. Where Jesus Christ is "lifted up" as the Saviour of the world, the pastor of that church need never fear lack of auditors.

—IT WOULD be well if school superintendents, public librarians and boards of education would follow the example of the teachers of Greenwich, Conn., who, acting as censors, have just barred from the high school library the works of Flaubert, Dumas, and other salacious and mendacious writers. There are too many of this class of books in our public libraries to-day. Every such volume is a source of contamination to the reader, especially to the young.

—EVEN in these days of prolific ingenious swindling, it is something novel to learn that there are such things as bogus gravestones. A few days ago fire was discovered in a cemetery in Brooklyn. When the firemen came they found, to their amazement, that a whole row of tombstones had been charred to blackened stumps, and others were burning. They soon put out the fire, and then it was found on investigation, that the stones were merely common pine, treated with some preparation which made them resemble marble and granite. This incident might suggest to some of our enterprising insurance companies a new risk on tombstone insurance.

—NEW YORK is threatened with an Easter bonnet famine, which will no doubt prove very distressing should it actually happen. Some 5,000 milliners have organized, and are ready to strike for higher wages. These workers have really only two busy seasons in the year—spring and fall—each of which lasts about three months, and their business has been run down by excessive competition so that they cannot make more than half as much as they earned a few years ago. Of course, a city without bonnets and toques, or any of the thousand indescribable creations that adorn femininity at Easter time, would be unthinkable, so the workers may secure a temporary triumph.

—LESS than twenty years ago, J. G. Tewksbury was one of the best known men in the East. Head of a banking house in New York; owner of a splendid residence, filled with rare tapestries, antiques and paintings; possessor of a stable of crack trotters and prize-winners, and with an abundance of means in various big paying investments; there were few men so well known or so popular as he. But things went wrong; his wealth took wings; horses, houses, pictures, paintings and money all vanished like smoke. Troubles piled upon him, and fortune no longer smiled. He died in a charity hospital in New Orleans a few days ago. Such was, in brief, the natural orbit of a life devoted to worldly pleasure, and little else. It carries its own moral.

—JUSTICE is not always slow-footed. The ring of swindlers who were defrauding the United States Treasury on sugar duties has just been compelled to pay $604,000 more on duties, making about $3,500,000 which the government has recovered thus far. Oliver Spitzer, one of the principals in the frauds, has been convicted and sentenced to two years in a Federal prison.

—BOSTON has been shaken to the dreadfully shocked besides by an Englishman living there, who has just

Music Lessons Free

IN YOUR OWN HOME.

A wonderful offer to every lover of music whether a beginner or an advanced player.

Ninety-six lessons (or a less number, if you desire) for either Piano, Organ, Violin, Guitar, Banjo, Cornet, Sight Singing, Mandolin or Cello will be given free to make our home study courses for these instruments known in your locality. You will get one lesson weekly, and your only expense during the time you take the lessons will be the cost of postage and the music you use, which is small. Write at once. It will mean much to you to get our free booklet. It will place you under no obligation whatever to us if you never write again. You and your friends should know of this work. Hundreds of our pupils write: "Wish I had known of your school before." "Have learned more in one term in my home with your weekly lessons than in three terms with private teachers, and at a great deal less expense." "Everything is so thorough and complete." "The lessons are marvels of simplicity, and my 11 year old boy has not had the least trouble to learn." One minister writes: "As each succeeding lesson comes I am more and more fully persuaded I made no mistake in becoming your pupil."

Established 1898—have thousands of pupils from seven years of age to seventy.

Don't say you cannot learn music but send for our free booklet and tuition offer. It will be sent by return mail free. Address U. S. SCHOOL OF MUSIC, Box 7, 225 Fifth Ave., New York City.

tten a book attacking the revolu- nary ancestors of many families, o have been proud of their descent fm the men who made history for t State and the country. This ter particularly selects the two Adams, John Hancock and Benjamin Franklin, and closes his tirade with t assertion that a majority of the ners of the Declaration of Indepen- dce were "bred to trade," some were spmasters and a few smugglers! After all, there are very few of us who c afford to go far back in our family te without making some startling d:coveries.

—During the first year of the psent administration in Cuba all epenses have been paid by the gov- ement, and $6,000,000 of the na- nal debt has been liquidated.

—Andrew Carnegie, who has given ny millions of dollars to public uses, kely told a reporter how he made his fit $10,000. He borrowed a few hun- dd dollars, repaying it at the rate of $a week, and investing the balance inn eighth interest in a sleeping-car nlel. This was how he got into the Plman Company. He was earning ov $40 a month at the time.

—Our Canadian neighbors are con- sering the establishment of a Naval Clege at Halifax, which will be a tining ground for men of the new Dinion fleet. It is proposed to snd $16,000,000 on warship construc- tin. Canada does not look forward tobecoming a mighty sea power, but wld be a useful auxiliary to the Btish navy in time of war.

—It's a singular thing that, after a ost every great calamity or disas- t somebody is almost sure to an- n nce, with a prodigious flourish of tmpets, that it was all predicted hy sebody else long ago. It is worth n ng, however, that these claims are alays made afterward; we never hear o hose wonderful prophets until the evt itself has become an old story. Apos, we note that some of the for- ei journals are giving prominence to a tory that a certain "wise woman," Jnna Southcote, long ago foretold tl Paris floods, saying that the "vials ofwrath were to be poured out upon F nce in 1910, when the nation was to bpunished for being hot in the pur- su of pleasure and cold in religion." Tre is nothing of the kind in the wtings of that famous visionary. Sh post facto prophecies are charac- testic of modern journalistic meth- oc Meanwhile, foreseen or not, the ir adation is producing widespread suering, and were it not for the gen- er conviction that France has abun- dt resources of her own (being the ri est country in Europe, if not in tl world) a golden shower of contri- bions would now be pouring in upon h As it is, the French government h issued a loan of $20,000,000 to re- li e the distress.

—Inventive genius of another kind, bt with the same mendacious purpose, is shown in a remarkable story which h lately been circulated in the Euro- pn and American press, to the effect th a live specimen of the brontosau- rt a gigantic amphibious lizard of prehistoric times, long since believed to be extinct, is still to be found in the wilds of Rhodesia, Africa. This huge monster, half elephant, half dragon, is said to live in dense swamps and to possess amazing strength and courage. There is little doubt that the story is a pure Munchausenism; but when Mr. Roosevelt returns, after his year among big game in the Dark Continent, he may be able to shed a little light on the brontosaurus, even if he is not lucky enough to have bagged one for the Smithsonian Institution.

—During his lifetime Mr. Gladstone twice declined the honor of a peerage, preferring to be known simply as "England's Great Commoner." What the distinguished father declined his son, Herbert Gladstone, has now accepted. In addition to a title he will receive the appointment of British Governor-General of United South Africa.

—Protestations of peace are plentiful at times when international good feeling prevails; but whenever some real or fancied cause of offense arises between two countries the language of brotherly love and conciliation is rudely thrown to the winds and the old savage leaps to the front again, loud and clamorous for bloodshed. Peru and Ecuador have a long-standing boundary dispute—a matter which they could easily have adjusted satisfactorily by arbitration. But they have quarreled about it; the swords are out of the scabbards, and unless intervention takes place speedily a mutually ruinous and wholly needless war will result. We have intervened acceptably in other South American disputes. Here is a good opportunity for our State Department to act once more as peacemaker.

—There are several important administration measures now before Congress. It is thought by close observers in Washington that the outlook is favorable for the bill for railroad regulation and the postal savings bank bill. Little if any progress has been made on the Arizona and New Mexico Statehood bills, and the outlook is not promising.

—There is talk in England of another general election early in June. Although the Liberals, by joining with the Laborites and Irish Nationalists, can still hold their own they may be so embarrassed by Unionist tactics that progress on the budget will be impossible, especially if the Nationalists abstain from a division. Meanwhile, the Nationalists appear to be almost in a position to dictate terms to the government. Should this apprehension be verified, an early election may be looked for.

They Look Like Raw Grains Magnified

Puffed Wheat or Puffed Rice looks much like raw grain viewed through a reading glass.

When shot from the guns the grain is puffed to eight times natural size- made four times as porous as bread.

Every starch granule is literally blasted to pieces, so the digestive juices act instantly.

The grain is cooked in its own moisture—exploded by its own steam—crisped by terrific heat.

Yet the grain coats are unbroken. We have the natural grain in its natural shape, made porous, nut-like and digestible.

The Most Wholesome Cereal Foods

Nature has placed in wheat and rice all the best of the food elements. But it remained for Prof. Anderson to make these grains wholly digestible—as they never were made before.

That's the real merit in Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice. Now you get the grain's whole food value.

But that isn't why people eat them. They are so enticing—so nut-like and crisp—that people forget why the grains are puffed—why the granules of starch are exploded.

Four people in five—as proved by lunch counter tests—like these foods better than any other ready-cooked cereals, when they judge them by taste alone.

Puffed Wheat, 10c
Puffed Rice, 15c Except in Extreme West

This is the curious process invented by Prof. Anderson, formerly of Columbia University.

The whole wheat or rice kernels are put into sealed guns. Then the guns are revolved for sixty minutes in a heat of 550 degrees.

The heat turns the moisture in the grain to steam, and the pressure becomes tremendous.

Then the guns are unsealed, and the steam explodes. Instantly every starch granule is blasted into a myriad particles.

Thus the grain is cooked—the starch granules exploded—the puffed grain is crisped by the heat. Then we have the whole grains made gigantic in size, but shaped just the same as before.

Used in Candy Making

Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are the ideal foods for breakfasts, luncheons and suppers. But children also delight in using Puffed Rice for candy. It makes a nut-like addition to fudge.

Don't be without these curious foods, for there is nothing else so good.

The Liquor War in Oklahoma

By George D. Conger, State Sup't, O. A. S. League

A FEW days ago we received your check for a contribution, by certain readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to "Prohibition in Oklahoma." We wish to express our gratitude for this interest. The present situation in Oklahoma is extremely important, and every bit of aid is much appreciated. A great victory has been won in Oklahoma, and the settlement of the new State is being attended by a degree of prosperity unknown in history. The liquor people, however, do not begin to fight until they are outlawed, and they are now seeking, by violation of law and by outrageous and utterly fictitious reports of violation, circulated through the press of the country, to break down sentiment and secure a resubmission of the question to the people of Oklahoma. They have already circulated their petition, and expect to file the same within a few weeks.

This is an attempt by the brewers and distillers of other States to amend the constitution of Oklahoma for their own benefit, and puts the people of Oklahoma on the defensive to protect the prohibition law and their constitutional rights. The liquor men admit that, in all probability, the election would eventually be declared unconstitutional, but they claim, if they could carry such an election in Oklahoma, it would make law enforcement very difficult here and that they would acquire about as much benefit thereby as though they secured license in place of prohibition. They further claim that this election, if carried by them, would have a very material effect in other States where efforts are now being made to bring about an election upon the question of Statewide prohibition.

We are, therefore, just in the beginning of an expensive and persistent fight in the courts and at the polls to protect our law and thoroughly establish it. We have the support and co-operation of the churches and the people of Oklahoma, and can secure fro. them all that they are able to give for this purpose; but these are constructive days in Oklahoma, and every church has on hand a building problem or a debt incurred in building. Many of them are still missionary fields, and the people are also building up public utilities, necessary to twentieth century civilization under prohibition law, so that it is difficult to secure sufficient funds in Oklahoma.

I am advised, through one of the great liquor journals, that a large fund has been raised by the brewers and distillers for use in Alabama, Tennessee and Oklahoma. We already have evidence that part of that fund has reached our State. The people expect us to combat the efforts of the rum power, and we are able to do so whenever sufficient funds are furnished for the purpose. We therefore very much appreciate the support of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and hope for its continuance.

TEMPERANCE NOTES

—A LOCAL option bill for cities, as a whole, has been introduced into the New York Legislature by Senator Brackett and Assemblyman Gray, under the auspices of the Anti-Saloon League. New York State allows local option by towns in the rural districts.

—IT IS estimated that 11,000 saloons were closed during 1908 and 15,000 during 1909. This means (remarks the American Issue) that "more than a billion fewer drinks of intoxicating liquors were taken by the American people during the last year than during the one immediately preceding."

—A KANSAS farmer was asked by a brewery agent: "What are you farmers going to do without a market for your grain, if you close the brewery and saloons?" "Well," was the reply, "stranger, I don't exactly know; but I guess we will have to raise a few more hogs and a few less jailbirds."

—Bonfort's Wine and Spirit Circular, a leading organ of the liquor trade, in a recent issue says: "The saloon business in this country is doomed unless the laws are so altered as to rid the trade of the disreputable elements." In view of the fact that almost all of last year saloons throughout the country have been closing at the rate of forty per day (as Dr. P. A. Baker reports), it is not surprising that the liquor trade should find the outlook a depressing one.

—THE Raleigh (N. C.) News and Observer, in a paragraph in a recent issue, throws this interesting light on the results of prohibition in that section: "Constable D. R. Byrum has begun the cultivation of a farm to help him make a living. He states that since prohibition had been in effect it had been impossible for him to make a living as an officer from his fees for arrests. He said it had been so long since he had made an arrest that he barely remembered the time, and that practically all that he earns now is derived from the service of civil papers. He puts all the 'blame' for the decrease in crime to the decrease in the consumption of liquor."

—AN INTERESTING comparison of the savings in "wet" and "dry" towns in Ohio is made by the Amerıean Issue. Two banks in Springfield reported an aggregate increase of $160,000 in deposits, two in Portsmouth $140,000, two in Urbana $80,000, one in Montpelier $35,000, one in Gilead $70,000, one in Jefferson $31,000, one in Piqua $35,000. This is a most convincing showing, and should not be without its effect on other cities.

—EX-GOVERNOR HANLY of Indiana is a man of broad views and wide experience. He writes concerning the temperance movement in Ohio, Indiana and Illinois: "We have closed enough saloons in these three States to extend a solid line along a street thirty-five miles long. We have sent home to breweries enough saloon counters to line a street one hundred miles long. We have turned $50,000,000 annually from this traffic into legitimate channels of trade—enough to give 50,000 families $1,000 a year, enough to maintain 250,000 people. This money has gone into raiment and food, and into the building of American homes, where wifehood and childhood could assemble with no cloud in the domestic sky."

Grandma's Presents

Dear Dr. Klopsch: The "Dreamland" calendar is lovely. We all appreciate it very much. "Daughters of Dorcas," and the sweet, pretty picture of children, "Golden Hours," are also greatly prized by us all. My little grandchildren call them "Grandma's Christmas presents." Thank you many times for your kind thoughtfulness of your subscribers, and us, not forgetting the loving Christmas greetings and the dear CHRISTIAN HERALD, which comes to us every week. Hero Tales from American Life has also arrived, and is worth twice what you charge. Chats With the Young Folks

By Kate Upson Clark

The Oldest Doll

HE pathetic story has been told of a famous actress that she never d a doll. She was alway: on the ge, beginning when she was only ee years old, and she never had any ne for the plays which little girls ually enjoy.

It is well known that the Society for e Prevention of Cruelty to Children s tried many times to interfere with employment of small children upon e stage, but they have not succeeded any great extent. Child labor is a ject just now attracting much attion, and the chances are that ere ng every child, poor or rich, will be owed to enjoy a happy, comfortable ldhood, with all that those words ply.

A happy childhood for most little ls usually means for each of them least one doll of her very own. at this has always been so is probe. We are sure that it has been so ce the time of William Penn, beise a doll which he brought over is l to be seen in Montgomery County, ryland, where it is cherished as a y precious keepsake.

f you will read your histories, you l find that William Penn had a ghter named Letitia.

Little Miss Letitia had a dear little ymate named Miss Rankin. Letitia nt to London with her father. hen she saw the shops full of dolls, remembered her little friend in erica.

"She hasn't any doll at all," Letitia d her father. "May I get her one? ere are no shops anywhere near the ods where she lives, so that she not buy one. I wish I could carry to her when we go back."

f you have read much about good benevolent William Penn, you will be surprised to know that he said once, "Certainly, get her the prett one you can find."

So Letitia picked out a "perfect uty." Her dress was of the finest iped brocade, and, as the ladies in se days wore hoopskirts, this wonful brocaded gown was distended h hoops also.

William Penn and his daughter took sage for America in the good ship terbury, and nothing they brought s more carefully packed than the l for little Miss Rankin.

You can imagine the joy of this child en she saw the beautiful present m famous London; but what do you nk she said?

"It is much too nice to play with. I going to wrap her up in a damask el, and strew lavender all over her, l only bring her out to show when have company."

This was exactly what she did; and s it has come to pass that this wonful court-lady doll has been handed n to our time.

For little Miss Rankin's daughters l granddaughters naturally said, l their daughters and granddaughs naturally said: "We mustn't nk of playing with great-grandmma's doll. It is much too hande to be played with. It is just for mpany doll."

One wonders if the doll would not e enjoyed herself better if she could e been petted and fed and rocked to p, and taken out a-visiting, like mmoner dolls, instead of being shut in a bureau drawer.

But no one has ever been able read the thoughts of even the st highly organized doll. They are mong the many great mysteries of s strange life of ours.

A Smart Weasel

A SAWMILL in one of our Western States was so full of rats that the men who worked there were seriously disturbed by them.

They tried various means to rid themselves of their tormentors, but nothing availed, until suddenly a long, slim weasel appeared on the scene, and began to make great havoc among the army of rats.

At last they seemed to be all gone excepting one big fellow, which was almost as large as the weasel himself and apparently quite his match in cunning.

The two met in open combat several times. The men watched them closely, and wondered if Mr. Rat were really clever and strong enough to hold his own against his wily enemy.

One day they observed that the weasel was busily digging in a pile of lumber. He worked for a long time, but finally reappeared and began looking for his usual prey.

After smelling and feeling here, there and everywhere, he at last came upon the rat. They engaged in a lively battle, which the men watched with interest.

After a while the weasel, as generally happened, seemed to be worsted, and started for the lumber pile, where he had been so long at work. Close behind him followed the victorious rat, evidently bent on making a complete finish of his adversary.

Both of them disappeared in the lumber pile. Then suddenly the weasel came running from the back of the pile, and, with an air as though desperate business were on hand, dashed again into the hole.

Then there was a long period of quiet. Finally the weasel came running out in a leisurely and contented manner, seeming to be in excellent condition after the long engagement.

The men were curious to know what had been going on. They accordingly, at considerable expense of time and patience, investigated the hole and discovered the following extraordinary facts, which are vouched for by the Minneapolis Journal:

The weasel had dug a sort of tunnel well under the lumber pile. This tunnel was large enough at its mouth to easily admit the rat. Then the astute weasel had made it gradually smaller and smaller, until as it approached the further aperture it was so small that the thin body of the weasel himself could hardly have squeezed through it.

Having decoyed the rat into this ingenious trap, the weasel slipped out ahead of him. Then he hurried around to the large end of the funnel, attacked the rat in the rear, and soon finished him.

It really looks as though something considerably deeper and keener than instinct were at work here. That weasel would possibly have made a very clever member of society if he could only have been trained and educated.

The Poetry of "Dreamland"

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I have just returned home and found your beautiful calendar and "Daughters of Dorcas" awaiting me. I have been a subscriber for many years, and have received many beautiful calendars and pictures from you, but this exceels them all. I felt moved, as I looked at "Dreamland," to say:

"As I looked upon the darling babe,
In slumber calm and mild,
If on it I should press a kiss,
I would find a living child."

"Fresh Eggs All Winter"

The secret that made $12,000 a year for two egg-raisers is told in the

Corning Egg-Book

THE story of the Cornings is already familiar to Christian Herald readers. You have no doubt read of how these two egg-raisers, coming from the city in poor health and beginning on a little place at Bound Brook, N. J., with only thirty hens, have, in four years, built up a business that in 1909 paid A CLEAR PROFIT OF OVER $12,000 A YEAR. But perhaps you thought of their achievement as you think of aeroplanes or Polar explorations—interesting, but having no close or vital relation to YOU.

It has, though. You and your family must have food. No other food can take the place of eggs. You must buy eggs or raise them. They have gone up to unheard-of prices. If you raise eggs and sell your surplus, you not only get your own supply of the best of all foods at low cost, but the high prices then go into your pocket, instead of coming out of it.

The Corning Egg-Book thus opens up a NEW MONEY-MAKING BUSINESS of tremendous possibilities. With this book for a guide, men and women living in city suburbs, towns or villages can raise fresh eggs the year round, and sell them at high prices, or eat them and SAVE the high prices. The demand for "fresh-gathered, fancy eggs" is never satisfied. Egg-raising is much simpler than poultry-raising. The hard work of killing, dressing, and marketing fowls is left out. The rest can be done by men in poor health, women, school-boys, girls, and others not qualified for regular business.

One of the three great laying houses, with 1500 pullets always at work, shelling out eggs by the bushel

Thousands of ambitious men and women have perceived these new possibilities, and the Corning Egg Book is having an immense sale. Its great and peculiar value lies in its tested and proved methods of RAISING FRESH EGGS ALL WINTER. To insure this result all your operations must be carefully calculated to FIT THE SEASONS, and

Now is the Time to Begin

The publishers of the Farm Journal realized the importance of what the Cornings had done, and saw that thousands of people would want to know how two novices could in four years make egg-raising pay $12,000 a year. So, in order to make their paper better known to people living in suburbs and small towns, with ground for gardening and keeping hens, they are now offering the Corning Egg Book to all who subscribe to the

to increase its subscription list to ONE MILLION for this year.

The Farm Journal, 33 years old, has the greatest circulation of ANY FARM PAPER IN THE WORLD,—more than 700,000 already. But it wants a million, and won't be entirely happy till it gets them. Its readers, however, say it is already the happiest and brightest paper of all. It believes in sunshine, kind words, honesty, prosperity, and "farmers and workers at the first table." It is clean, brief, "boiled down," intensely practical. "Cream, not skim-milk," is its motto. "Judge Biggle" and "Harriet," his wife, have for thirty years stood up for the farmer's wife, the boys, the girls, and the dumb animals, and they are so optimistic that they have hopes of even "Peter Tumbledown." The Farm Journal never prints a fraudulent or trashy advertisement, and readers TRUST IT so fully that advertisers get most unusual returns. It is, in a dozen ways, "unlike any other paper."

A LITTLE TALK ON SAVING

NOW that it is generally agreed that the cost of living is advancing year by year, it behooves the man of moderate means to devise some way of increasing his income to keep pace with his outgo. It will not do to suppose that the present high cost of food products is but the crest of a wave, or price movement, which will go down in a little while. The opinion of the best authorities indicates that it will continue to go higher, and there is no telling what the maximum may be. If this be true, then the man of limited income will, theoretically at least, become poorer as the years go by, unless he provide some means for adding to his income on the side, or so arrange his domestic affairs that his outgo will be decreased. The city man will suffer a greater handicap than his country cousin, for the latter may do many things to solve the problem of his increasing expenditures which would not be possible to the dweller in the city house. But whatever either of them does will, in the circumstances, be accomplished only with the help of ready money.

Ready money! Probably more men learned the value of ready money during the financial depression than ever before during a similar period. Opportunities for cheap investment abounded on all sides, and the man with ready money was master of the situation. But not many possessed it. Those who did took care to hide it in lock-boxes, where they could draw upon it in case of need, and only the rich in such cases dared to use it beyond the necessities. There was one multimillionaire who, foreseeing the condition, drew upon all the available currency he could obtain from his local banks, and left his Middle West city well nigh penniless, while he stayed in New York, lending out the cash at usurious interest. On the other hand, thousands of business men of good standing, but accustomed to doing business on credit, suddenly found themselves without funds and were forced, in many cases, to borrow on their insurance policies merely to keep going.

The depression of 1908 was a concrete example of what the sociologists say is in store for us, over a more extended period, if the cost of living goes on increasing at the rate it has for the last ten years; and, though the picture may be overdrawn, still the lesson of the panic was sharp enough to start many a preparation for the rainy day in quarters where extravagance was formerly the rule. Savings banks everywhere report an increase in the number of depositors, some of whom have built up their accounts from the very humblest of beginnings.

"When I hear a man who draws a fair salary complain that he cannot save money," remarked a well-known financier recently, "I make up my mind that he doesn't really want to. It is all a matter of will power." But this is hardly fair, for temperament and environment play a large part, and there are thousands of people who now live up to the limit of their incomes who would be more than willing to acquire the habit of saving could they but clear the way for a start and could an arrangement be made whereby it would be impossible for them to give way to the sudden impulse to spend. That impulse to spend seems to be inherent in mankind. The weak man who leaves his money with another, with the request that it be not returned before a specified date, no matter what the plea, is merely putting a time-lock on his impulse to spend. Savings bank officials recognize the power of this impulse and seek to combat it by making it more troublesome for people to withdraw money from banks than to deposit it. Some of them go further than this, in recognition of the fact that the smaller the sum of money the greater its capacity for burning the pocket, by providing for their depositors small portable banks, in which coins may be slipped at odd moments, and which can be opened only by the officials in the central institution itself. This money is then added to the depositor's account and begins to draw interest. And here we come upon the most interesting law in the philosophy of money saving.

Money is either a hard master or a good servant. You must either work for it or have it work for you. There is no greater slave than the miser, no freer man than he whose worldly goods beget a healthful increase year by year. Merely to save money is not enough. Idle money costs more in care and worriment than it is worth, and even the rich cannot afford to have it around. But money has this attractive quality: Like the celestial bodies, it seems to possess a law of gravitation, that causes any quantity of it to attract to itself smaller quantities, and so even the most insignificant amount started in the right direction cannot help in the end but compound itself into a fortune.

Vanderbilt's Advice

"My son," said the elder Vanderbilt, "the man who gets six per cent. on his capital, and gets it long enough, will sooner or later own all the money in the world." And so it is not sufficient that you save, but that you save in such a manner that your money will work day and night, enlarging upon itself.

Now it is not necessary to have the money of a Vanderbilt to do this, for many ways and means have been provided for the poor man to have his money begin work for him as soon as he begins to save it. Furthermore, these methods are precisely those which, on a larger scale, have helped increase the fortunes of our best known millionaires. For instance, it can be said truly that the Vanderbilt fortune reached its present enormous volume through investment in railroad securities. Rockefeller, through his Standard Oil connection, is probably the greatest holder of industrial securities. The Astor fortune was the result of an ever-growing increase in the value of New York real estate. Russell Sage made the greater part of his fortune through lending his money at interest. Hetty Green is adding substantially to her income with the assistance of mortgages, while the Hyde fortune was built upon life insurance.

Taking almost any of these methods it is possible for the man who has a small amount to his credit, and the assurance of a regular income, to begin an investment that should grow with the years. In railroad securities he should confine himself to interest-bearing bonds, and if the amount for the purchase of the first certificate be not immediately available, there are bond houses which will supply him with the desired security, upon a series of easy payments. If he prefer to put out his money at interest, à la Russell Sage, there are plenty of savings concerns which will accept it of him piecemeal, paying him an annual stipend for the use of it. Industrial securities may be purchased upon the most elastic of terms, the degree of elasticity depending upon the particular security offered. Mortgages, even those guaranteed by the surety companies, may now be purchased upon arer, more applicable, than ours; ile the administration of justice, espially in the lower courts, is speedie has more of finality, and is less on to criticism than in this country.

Our Heart-breaking Delays

Samuel J. Tilden, who was a recognized authority on legal subjects, e said: "Multiplicity of constitutns results in complexity of laws and confusion in practice." Just think of Not only do we have our Federal urts—Supreme, Circuit, District—which laws have been enacted by ngress, but we have forty-six sovereignties with whose legislature-made ws the Federal judges do not interfere unless they violate the national nstitution itself.

In a recent address before the National Association of Attorneys-General, Attorney-General O'Malley said: "Generally speaking, the history of forcing these laws in this country is record of protracted litigation. If a deral statute, its provisions are assailed from the lowest to the highest deral court. If a State law, its lidity must be established in every ate court of the State enacting it d oftentimes in every Federal court fore it is enforceable."

In a recent address President Taft ed a full hour in deprecating our teworthy delays of justice, and mmed up by saying:

"Of all the questions that are before e American people I regard no one more important than this, to wit: e improvement of the administration justice. We must make it so that e poor man will have as nearly as ssible an equal opportunity in lititing as the rich man, and under esent conditions, ashamed as we may of it, this is not the fact."

What are known as "rights of peal" in America are far more tensive than in England, while in ntinental countries they are so circumscribed as to result in a minimum delay in adjudication of cases, civil criminal. President Taft also ints out that a murder case in England will be disposed of in two or ree days that here will take three, ur, five weeks, or even more.

There are civil suits on the dockets the older States that have been in e courts for more than a generation, d many cases are noted in the law ports where two succeeding sets of aintiffs have been substituted for the iginal suitors by reason of the death the latter from old age.

Very recently an important automole patent case (the Selden) was deded in favor of the inventor and gainst sundry manufacturers. The tter gave out published interviews, which they stated, without evasion r doubt, that by reason of appeals the se would be continued until the pats in question had expired.

Mayor McClellan, of New York City, a recent address at Malone, N. Y., gards paternalism as one of our cryg evils, pleads for a return to the sturdy individualism of the Fathers f the Republic," and adds:

"With the best will in the world, hose in charge of government have ried to cover every field of human enleavor by legislative enactment inended to carry us by the shortest ossible route to the millennium."

Hon. Everett P. Wheeler, chairman f the American Bar Association's Committee on Delay and Expense in egal Procedure, quotes a Philadelhia judge as saying that he did not it to do justice, but to administer the aw. Comment on such a statement is nnecessary.

There is no need to multiply citaions and quotations. Every adult eader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who as had to seek recourse to the courts for righting of wrongs or for adjudication of rights knows the quirks and turns his lawyer or the opposing counsel gave to matters that should have been plain and undisputed, and many must have thought that the court was more interested in legal technicalities than in securing a righteous and prompt decision.

Every reader can recall cases of miscarriage, or long postponement, of justice in cases that have come within his personal knowledge or daily perusal of newspapers. It is, alas! hard to refute the cry of social agitators that a long purse is more useful in civil or criminal proceedings than mere justice of claim or innocence of person.

The Nation Awakening

It is good to note that the evils manifest in our laws and in procedures thereunder have become matters of interest and moment to Americans. They are thinking on the subject. Their best judges, lawyers and public men are writing, speaking, weighing, determining, and in America, when the people and the publicists agree on need for amendment, the remedies will be found and applied in due course.

In the last Presidential campaign no questions were more widely or more interestingly argued than those affecting that important phase of legal practice known as the injunction. Good has come of that discussion, and more is to follow.

In nearly every State in the Union are Bar Associations, in close touch with the American Bar Association, and these aggregations of legal knowledge are a unit in demanding amendment in vital matters of law and method. Remedies by the hundred are proposed at every meeting of every association, and in some States, notably in Wisconsin, a start for betterment has been made. In private often, in public on several occasions, the august justices of the United States Supreme Court have voiced their belief that radical amendment is necessary, and have pointed out ways and means in specific instances of wrong.

Some of the Remedies Proposed

It is impossible for the layman to digest and put before the public one tithe of the technical difficulties and obstructions, set forth in the voluminous literature of the last few years, regarding the subjects considered above. A few of the plainest and most needed reforms can be paragraphed with profit, that readers may know the trend toward improvement already manifest in statutes enacted by State Legislatures. Here are some of the suggestions offered by President Taft, and others high in counsel of the people, premising that some of the reforms are embodied in a bill now before Congress, having been presented in the House by Representative Alexander of New York and in the Senate by Senator Nelson of Minnesota:

Greater care in the selection of judges in all courts of record.

Some system by which unfit men may be eliminated from police magistracies.

More judges in districts wherein the courts are congested. (It is urged that this need not apply to New York, as it is asserted this State has more judges now, for its population of 8,000,000, than have England and Wales, with 27,000,000.)

Better salaries for judges, so that financial sacrifice may not be entailed upon good men.

This suggestion from the American Bar Association:

"The whole judicial power of each State, at least for civil causes, should be vested in one great court, of which

Serial 6% Bonds

Secured by a Thousand Farms

Our Reclamation bonds—both Drainage and Irrigation—are secured by first liens on rich farm lands — sometimes a thousand farms.

The most fertile, most valuable farm lands in America are lands reclaimed by irrigation or drainage.

Among them are our finest fruit lands, worth from $1,000 to $4,000 per acre. And there are millions of irrigated acres, devoted to general farming, where the average crop is two or three times the average in other localities.

No reclamation project is financed by us save where the land has exceptional value. Bonds based on such land, with such high earning power, form, in our estimation, the safest sort of security.

Doubly Secured

Irrigation bonds are usually doubly secured. First, we have a mortgage on all the property in which the proceeds of the bonds are invested. The investment in this property is sometimes twice the bond issue.

The bonds are additionally secured by first liens on the lands and the orchards watered. These liens are given by individual land owners in payment for water rights. They draw six per cent. interest, and are paid off in annual instalments. These payments are used to retire the bonds as they mature.

Often a thousand such separate liens are deposited with a trustee as security for the bonds as a whole. And the bonded indebtedness rarely exceeds one-fourth of the land's cash value. The first crop from the land is often sufficient to pay the whole lien.

Some irrigation bonds are "Carey Act bonds," where the State supervises the project. Some are municipal obligations, issued by organized districts. Such bonds, like school bonds, form a tax lien on the district.

Any rightly selected Reclamation bond affords one an ideal security.

Any Amount—Any Maturity

Irrigation bonds are generally issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000, so one may invest either little or much.

They are serial bonds, part of which are paid annually, as the farmers pay off their liens. So one may select either long-time or short-time investments.

The interest rate is six per cent.—a liberal rate for conservative farm lien securities.

Among those who investigate them, Reclamation bonds are the most popular bonds that we handle. Many of our customers are now exchanging through us their low-income bonds for these more attractive securities.

16 Years' Experience

Our experience with Reclamation bonds covers sixteen years. During that time we have handled 78 separate issues, some of which have run into millions of dollars. All have been based on first liens on good farm land, and not a dollar of loss has resulted to any investor.

Our organization now includes engineers and attorneys of national fame, and of the widest experience in connection with reclamation. An officer of our Company constantly resides in the irrigated country watching the projects we finance.

Our position in this field gives us the pick of the projects, so we confine ourselves to the most desirable issues. Our investigations are all made on the ground, and by the most competent men we know.

We have written a book on Irrigation Bonds, based on all this experience. Every investor, small or large, owes to himself its perusal. Cut out this coupon as a reminder to write us today for this book.

By Assisting Nature in a Scientific Manner

After my university course, I concluded I could be of greater help to my sex by assisting Nature to regain and retain the strength of every vital organ, by bringing to it a good circulation of pure blood; by strengthening the nerves, and by teaching deep breathing, than I could by correcting bodily ailments with medicine. It is to my thorough knowledge of anatomy, physiology and health principles that I attribute my marvelous success. I have helped over 44,000 women. I can help you to

Arise To Your Best

I have given to each woman that satisfaction with self which comes through the knowledge that she is developing that sweet, personal loveliness which health and a wholesome, graceful body gives---a cultured, self-reliant woman with a definite purpose, which makes her the greatest help to family and friends. She is a Better Wife, a Rested Mother, a Sweeter Sweetheart. She adds to the beauty of the world, thus contributing to its refinement, cultivation and education. I can help you to make every vital organ and nerve do efficient work, thus clearing the complexion and correcting such ailments as

Constipation	Irritability	Indigestion
Weak Nerves	Colds	Dullness
Rheumatism	Nervousness	Weaknesses
Sleeplessness	Torpid Liver	Catarrh

This work is done by following simple directions a few minutes each day in the privacy of your own room. In delicate cases I co-operate with the physician. I regard medicine for reduction as dangerous, and bandages and reducing appliances do not remove the cause, hence only give temporary results. In correcting faulty habits of digestion and assimilation, I build up the strength while I am reducing, or developing you. This is practical common sense.

Think it over and write me to-day for particulars.

I have corrected thousands of figures as illustrated below. Style is in the figure and poise and not in the gown. The gown in Fig. 1 cost $250; the one in Fig. 2 cost $6.00. Fig. 2 is the same woman as Fig. 1, developed and in correct poise. Figs. 3, 4, 5 and 6 show actual photographs of pupils before taking up my work. (They have given me permission to use them). They all stand, now, as correctly and appear as well as Fig. 2.

Too Fleshy or Too Thin

When every organ of the body is doing efficient work, there will be no superfluous flesh and no bony, angular bodies. I have reduced thousands of women 80 lbs., and have built up thousands of others 25 lbs. What I have done for others can do for you. It would do your heart good to read the daily reports from my pupils. Here are some of them:

"My weight has increased 30 lbs." "My kidneys are much better." "My eyes are much stronger and I have taken off my glasses." "I have not had a sign of indigestion or gall stones since I began with you." "I weigh 83 lbs. less, and have gained wonderfully in strength. I never get out of breath, the rheumatic twinges have all gone, and I look and feel 15 years younger." "I am delighted with the effect upon my catarrh." "Just think of it! To be relieved from constipation. Entirely free after having it for 30 years!" "Have grown from a nervous wreck into a state of steady, quiet nerves." "The relief from backache alone is worth many times the money, and I haven't had a cold since I began with you."

Write me to-day, telling your faults of health and figure. If I cannot help you, I will tell you so. I study your case just as a physician, giving you the individual treatment which your case demands. I never violate a pupil's confidence. I will send you an instructive booklet, showing correct lines of a woman's figure in standing and walking, FREE.

all tribunals should be branches, departments or divisions. The business as well as the judicial administration of this court should be thoroughly organized, so as to prevent not merely waste of judicial power, but all needless clerical work, duplication of papers and records, and the like, thus obviating expense to litigants and cost to the public."

The abolition of fees and the adoption of fixed salaries for clerks, court employees and stenographers.

The adoption of the English system of referees, so that the latter shall have more authority and their decisions shall hasten findings of law and fact.

Reducing the avenues of appeal from a trial court to a higher court.

Giving more power to the bench as to practice in criminal cases and lessening the volume of tenable objections and exceptions.

Clearer settlement, by law, of questions of jurisdiction.

More drastic punishment for perjury.

Longer terms for attorneys-general and for prosecuting attorneys, and a more careful scrutiny of the fitness of candidates for these offices.

Gradual but radical simplification of our codes and statutory laws.

Greater scope to juvenile courts, so that the country at large may have the benefits that Denver has gained through the efforts of Judge Lindsey.

More power to judges, that they may legally aid juries in the trial of intricate civil or criminal cases.

No one save pettifoggers, professional politicians, fraudulent bondsmen, criminals, sharpers and confidence men is interested in maintaining the present status of delay, complexity and multiplicity in our laws. It is fair to presume reform is as sure as it is desirable.

the easy-payment plan, and so may New York real estate.

Mortgages and Real Estate

In both mortgages and real estate everything depends upon the character of the concern which offers the proposition. Most of the metropolitan companies which issue mortgage bonds have them secured by real estate somewhere in the growing section of the metropolis. And, if the mortgagor fails to pay, the company will pay the bondholder anyhow. In buying New York real estate you have not this guarantee, but you have an expectancy of greater profits, based on the probability that the land you buy will ultimately become a metropolitan centre. If it doesn't, you make no profit. In the insurance line there are many propositions being offered which should prove attractive to the investor, and, as has already been pointed out in a former article, some of these even provide a periodical income for the investor's family long after his death.

But whatever the line followed by the man of small means, the amount of his savings is no longer an obstacle. He may begin to make his money work for him at once. A great deal has been said about the evils of the installment system in its relation to household goods; but, on the other hand, it has added more home comforts to the lives of the submerged tenth than almost any other commercial influence. And somewhat the same reasoning might apply to this idea of making money work for its owner. In other words, if it is possible to do in a small way what the powerful are doing in a big way, why not do it? Start saving now!

How to Be Strong*

"TO be weak is miserable, doing or suffering," said one of our great poets.

Weakness, the feeling that the work which lies before us is more than we can perform, is one of the most depressing among all the hard burdens of life.

To one who has a clear vision of duty and truth, the call comes imperiously to reveal them to others. It is not enough that we ourselves possess the means of salvation; the noble soul longs to give them to others.

The great missionary movement is an outgrowth of this beautiful spirit. All of our settlement and "service" work springs from it. It is the regenerator of the world—the human exponent of the Holy Spirit, the Comforter.

"I believe to the very depths of my being that the Gospel of Christ is the saving truth," testified one great witness; "and I want to have everybody else believe it. I am anxious to work all the rest of my life, night and day, to promote the cause I so fully believe in. I want to acquire all the influence I can, in order that I may be stronger to attract men to Christ's side and convince them of these great truths."

It is a praiseworthy ambition. Let us all constantly strive to make ourselves more and more powerful, not for the sake of the power, but because by means of it we may more efficiently aid the great work of Christ in the world.

Make all the money that you honestly can; get all the education that you can; improve your personal appearance, your manners, and your mode of speech; keep your health up; fulfil every duty so that no criticism can justly be passed upon your faithfulness; all these are main elements of strength, and God wants us all to be strong for him. By appealing daily to him for his guidance and help, these elements will come to the earnest seeker.

But even though stern poverty, crippling illness and every personal disadvantage should be your lot, still God can grant strength for his work. Think of the wonderful and blessed labors of Bella Cooke, bedridden for more than fifty years! And she is only one of many consecrated "shut-ins," from whose chambers have streamed out upon the world God's light and life.

"We want power to teach, win, save; we want the secret of the utmost energy for the finest ends; we want at once sympathy and mastery; we want the perfectest service," writes Dr. Albert J. Lyman of this vital subject.

Mrs. Darwin R. James, in her thrilling address in 1905 upon "National Obligations," recited some of the wonderful achievements of our young country, as follows: "Our steel manufacturers compete successfully with those of Great Britain within her own colonial possessions. Who built the Gohtiek viaduct, the longest in the world, in Upper Burma? Who built the numerous viaducts in Uganda? Who carried the power from Cauvery Falls, in Mysore, India, ninety miles to the gold fields of Kohla, guarding the wires against danger from the elephants' trunks above, and the posts from the white ants below? Who stands ready to solve any problem the world can offer? Young America! What could we not accomplish if the same ability, energy and enthusiasm which are now in the service of the world, were turned to the advancement of Christ's kingdom?"

Let us use all our powers to enlist the immense strength of our nation wholly in God's cause.

"Seeds that Grow" of the Burpee-Quality

COST more but are worth more than the difference in cost! Of seeds it is always true that "the Best is the Cheapest" — and that is one reason why we have maintained the Largest Mail-Order Seed Trade in the World. To prove to others that QUALITY COUNTS and to demonstrate the value of the New BURPEE SPECIALTIES we now offer

"Four of the Finest" Novelties— Your Choice—for Only 25 Cents!

Separately the nine varieties named below each cost (excepting Fordhook Melon) 15 cts. per pkt.,—but you can select any Four varieties for 25 cts. (silver or stamps) while we will mail ALL NINE VARIETIES FOR 50 CENTS. Separately these Nine Novelties at prices "per pkt." amount to $1.30.

Burpee's "Dwarf-Giant" Tomato. The flesh is so firm and the tomatoes so heavy that they might be described "solid as a rock!" It is the most nearly seedless of all tomatoes. Of handsome dwarf, erect growth, the bushes produce enormous crops of the most beautiful tomatoes which are truly gigantic in size and absolutely unequaled in delicious flavor. Per pkt. 15 cts.; ¼ oz. 40 cts.; oz. $1.50.

Earliest Catawba Sweet Corn. (see Illustration), A real rival to our famous Golden Bantam both in extreme earliness and surpassingly delicious flavor. Some planters say it is even better than Bantam! For illustrations, description and "reports," see Burpee's Annual for 1910. Per pkt. 15 cts.; ½ pint 30 cts.; pint 50 cts., postpaid.

Fordhook Bush Lima. The only stiffly erect Bush form of the popular "Potato" Lima. It is altogether unique and of incalculable value to American gardens. Both pods and beans are twice the size of the Kumerle, while the "fat" beans are of the same delicious flavor as Burpee's Bush Lima. Per pkt. 15 cts.; ½ pint 25 cts.; pint 40 cts., postpaid.

Burpee's Nameless Bush Bean. See Illustration. This is also quite unique and we will pay $100 for a suitable name—also other liberal cash prizes for 1910. It is the "Best of All"—superior to Burpee's Stringless Green-Pod—and is White-seeded. For illustrations from photographs and full particulars, see Burpee's Annual for 1910. Seed very scarce. Per pkt. (only 30 Beans!) 15 cts.

AN AVERAGE SIZE POD OF BURPEE'S NAMELESS BUSH BEAN
We will pay $100 cash for a name!

"Wayahead" Lettuce. So named because it is the earliest, most solid and surest-heading of all early "Butterhead" Lettuces. Per pkt. 15 cts.; oz. 45 cts.

Fordhook Musk Melon. Heavily netted melons, with thick golden-red flesh of exquisite flavor. A better shipper than our original Netted Gem, the "Rocky Ford" Melon, and as sweet as our famous Emerald Gem! Per pkt. 10 cts.; oz. 30 cts.

African "Golden-Orange" Daisy (Dimorphotheca Aurantiaca). As easily grown as any common annual, this is entirely unique in color and most strikingly beautiful! It has created a sensation wherever seen, and you can get some idea of its rare beauty from the colored plate in Burpee's New Annual for 1910. Per pkt. 15 cts.

"Variegated-Queen" Nasturtiums in Superb Mixture for 1910. Of tall growth, bearing flowers of many bright colors. The leaves are so beautifully variegated with yellow, white and green that the plants would be worthy of culture even for fotiage alone. Per pkt. 15 cts.; per oz. 35 cts.

New "Spencer" Sweet Peas. Many colors of the gigantic waved and frilled "Spencers"—in unequaled mixture. These new seedlings of the true "orchid-flowered" crinkled type will give a rare treat to lovers of Sweet Peas. We won the only Gold Medal of the National Sweet Pea Society in London the past summer that was ever awarded outside of Great Britain! Per pkt. 15 cts.; per oz. 45 cts.; ¼ lb. $1.25.

50 Cts. buys all the above nine packets or you can select any FourVarieties for 25 cts.

Questions and Answers

In forwarding MSS. to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, enclose stamped envelopes for return, if unavailable.

Mrs. H. E. P., Madison, Me. Will you please tell me, through the columns of OUR MAIL-BAG, the name of the lower bird on your calendar for 1905?

The Evening Grosbeak.

J. R. McM., Winston-Salem, N. C. Please give a short sketch of Helen Keller, from childhood to the present. I see you mention her so often.

Miss Helen Adams Keller was born in Tuscumbia, Ala., in 1880. She is descended from Alexander Spottswood, Colonial Governor of Virginia, on her father's side, and through her mother is related to the Adams and Everett families of New England. When nineteen months old illness made her deaf and blind. She was educated by Miss Anne Sullivan, who, by wonderful tact and ingenuity, prepared her sufficiently to enter Radcliffe College. Miss Keller has written for the magazines and also the story of her life. She lives in Wrentham, Mass.

E. A. S., Provincetown, Mass. Please explain Rev. 18:4; II. Cor. 6:17; Isa. 52:11, and Jer. 51:45.

1. This is God's warning of judgment on apostate Christendom in the "last days." Christendom, divided into many sects, is Babylon (confusion); and corrupt, lifeless Christendom is the worst of all. Apostate Christendom is not to be converted, but destroyed. 2. Paul here applies his argument to the Corinthian Church, warning it against the prevalent vices of the day, among them being idolatry and licentiousness. 3. (See also Isa. 48:20 and Zech. 2:6, 7). This relates to the prospect of leaving Babylon, where they had long resided, and which many were loth to leave. Nebuchadnezzar had carried them thither (II. Chron. 36:18), and Cyrus restored them (Ezra 1:7-11).

Mrs. A. D., Groton, Conn. Where is Mount McKinley, mentioned in the Cook-Peary controversy?

Mount McKinley, the highest peak in North America, is in Alaska.

R. A. W., Westminster, Md. Please explain Matt. 8:22.

It is not necessarily to be interpreted as making light of natural affection, but rather as showing that Christ does not tolerate the half-hearted in religion. Besides (as is shown in Luke 7:12) it was the custom to hury on the day of death; hence (writes one commentator) it is hardly probable that this man would have been here at all if his father had just breathed his last. In any event, if he had been with his father at such a time, our Lord would not have hindered him from discharging the duties of a son.

P. H., Elliott, Ill. 1. In what country, or by what nation, was crucifixion used as a mode of execution, and what was its origin? 2. Was the apostle Paul crucified with head downward?

Crucifixion was employed to inflict death by the Egyptians, the Carthaginians, Assyrians, Scythians, Germans, and among the Romans in the earliest times. No one knows when and how it originated. 2. It is not definitely known in what manner Paul met his death. One account says he was beheaded.

G. A. A., Marcellus, N. Y. 1. Is there a collection of Thomas Hood's poems in one volume? 2. Where can I find his poem "The Haunted House"?

1. Yes. 2. Undoubtedly in the volume. The lines you ask for are unfamiliar to us.

Mr. A. S. Arnold, Woonsocket, R. I., sends this concerning vivisection: "The belief that we should do evil that good may come is unchristian. One of the proofs is that since, through vivisection, Pasteurism was inaugurated there are ten cases of hydrophobia where there was one before. We have, through the New York Herald, frequently challenged the citation of one well-authenticated case where the Pasteur treatment ever cured a man of hydrophobia, but the challenge has not been accepted. Many who took preventive treatment have died, while over 15,000 dog bites, received by agents of the N. Y. S. P. C. A., developed not a single case of the disease. I have treated two severe bites in the calf of my leg with carbolic acid, and a woman's terribly lacerated hand with ammonia, but no symptoms of hydrophobia. In conclusion, if no needless cruelty is practised, why the "closed door," instead of coming to the light in vindication? And if one of my Christian idols, John Wesley, is correct in saying that our domestic animals are sub-human and are immortal, should we dare vivisect these immortal beings?"

Reader, Perdue, Ore. 1. How long was it after Christ's resurrection that Christians adopted Sunday for the Jewish Sabbath? 2. Who was Madame Guyon?

1. The apostles themselves introduced the religious observance of Sunday for divine service (Acts 20:7; I. Cor. 16:2). 2. Madame Guyon was a mystic, of French birth, who lived 1648-1717. She wrote much, and her works were a subject of sharp controversy and were condemned by Rome. Her writings were published in forty volumes, in Paris, seventy-five years after her death. Your other question is not within the scope of THE MAIL-BAG.

R. McD., Dubuque, Ia. How many new books of all kinds were published in the United States last year?

Ten thousand one hundred and ninety-five new books and 708 new editions of books previously published. The largest class was general literature and the collected works of standard authors, which was represented by 1,136 volumes; fiction had 1,098 (somewhat less than the preceding year); theology and religion had 903, a slight increase.

A. B. W., Beaman, Mo. What is the difference between an apostle and a disciple?

A disciple is a follower, a student, or, in the Gospel sense, a believer who imitates the example of Christ and follows in his footsteps. An apostle is one who has been chosen for a special work or mission. Thus the twelve whom Christ chose were apostles, because they were to spread the Gospel among mankind and to organize Christian circles, and they were invested with special powers and gifts. The words "apostles" and "disciples," however, are often used interchangeably.

H. B., Idaho. How shall we understand St. Paul in I. Cor. 7:15?

The passage should be translated "separateth himself," offended with her Christianity and refusing to live with her unless she renounce it. The woman is not bound to renounce the faith for the sake of retaining an unbelieving husband and to wreck her own eternal happiness to gratify his unbelief. Your questions regarding divorce involve a long discussion, on which we cannot enter here. While the conditions of life have changed greatly since Christ's day, the great moral principles involved in his teaching are unaltered and stand good to-day. Conflicting divorce laws in our various States cause trouble and confusion, but do not affect the underlying principles, which should be the basis of all law on this subject.

P. W., Oelwein, Ia. 1. What became of Lazarus after Jesus raised him from the dead? 2. Was he a spiritual being after his resurrection? 3. Is there any record as to how long the widow's son lived?

That the future life was a part of the Jewish belief, even in ancient times, is now conceded by the best Biblical and historical authorities. Famous Christian Testimonies

John H. Converse

ONE of the foremost business men, known and respected throughout the country, is Mr. John H. Converse, president of the Baldwin Locomotive Works, Philadelphia. He is a man who carries religion into business in the most practical way, and is prominently identified with many philanthropies and religious enterprises. His wide experience brings him in contact with all kinds of business men, and hence he was chosen as one well qualified to give an answer to the question:

"Is the spirit of Jesus more dominant in business and public affairs than when you entered active life, and is it an advantage or not for a public man to-day to be known as a professing Christian?"

Mr. Converse's reply, which is given below, is clear and to the point and should be an encouragement and inspiration to all who read it:

BALDWIN LOCOMOTIVE WORKS
PHILADELPHIA

Dear Sir: December 16, 1909.

Your favor of the 8th inst. was duly received, in which you ask me to reply to the question: "Are Jesus Christ's teachings making actual progress in the world?"

My answer is in the affirmative. I believe that the principles of Jesus are more dominant in politics, business, and international affairs now than formerly. The promotion of arbitration, as instanced by the Hague Conference, shows the tendency in this direction.

In business, a reputation for integrity and for all that is covered by a profession of loyalty to Christ, counts for a distinct advantage. Character is an asset in business, and is absolutely a necessary basis for the great transactions involving vast sums which are the usual incident of important business operations.

The creation and maintenance of hospitals and homes are a distinct development of the influence of Christianity. They were unknown in ancient civilization, and to-day are evidence of the dominance of the spirit of Christ.

Very truly yours,

John H. Converse

CROWD GATHERING ON A STREET CORNER IN PHILADELPHIA TO STOP THE PASSAGE OF CARS

PHILADELPHIA'S GREAT STRIKE

NOT for many years has there been a strike characterized by such determination on both sides, so many scenes of mob violence and such great destruction of property as in the one now ing carried on against the Rapid Transit Com- ny by the streetcar employees in Philadelphia. he men went out on Saturday, February 19, and thin three days hundreds of cars had been recked or burned, three people had been killed out- ght and the hospitals were full of people who had en wounded by pistol bullets or by bricks, stones id bolts thrown by strikers or strike sympathizers. stol shots sounded in the streets almost as often they did in the avenues of St. etersburg a year or two ago, hen the Russian disturbances ere at their height, and for ie passer-by they were nearly dangerous. In fact, if a vis- or from abroad had suddenly rived in the shopping district the City of Brotherly Love— district usually as staid and spectable as could be found nywhere in America—he ould have thought that he as in the midst of a revolu- on when he saw the surging owds, heard the roar of the ob as a car was attacked, erturned or set on fire, and otormen and conductors were agged from the platforms id assaulted, many so se- ously that their recovery is t of the question.

Philadelphia depends on its olleys perhaps more than any her place in the East, with ie possible exception of Bos- n, which is also a city of sub- rbs, in which thousands of usiness men make their homes hile their offices are down- wn or in the central part of ie city. As usually happens in case of a strike, ie people were put to great inconvenience; the opkeepers kept their stores open with no custom- rs in sight, while the few who ventured on the cars ere subjected to hair-raising experiences, in the ay of having the cars toppled over or bullets sent rough the windows, which they will never forget nless "peaceful Philadelphia" has another strike orse than this one.

The men of the union were called out at one o'clock the afternoon, and by Saturday night almost very line in the city was tied up or badly crippled, though the transit company made every effort to keep as many cars as possible running with the twelve hundred men who remained in its employ. The strike was called with the sanction of the national officers of the Amalgamated Association of Street and Electric Employees. Some such action had been expected, though not quite so soon, as the trouble between the men and the company had been patched up, but the truce was not considered permanent, and the third week of February matters at issue reached an acute stage.

The immediate cause of the strike was the discharge, on the preceding day, of a large number of men. The strikers declare that about six hundred or more were told that their services would no longer be required, and they think this action could be construed in no other way than as the beginning of a lockout. The officials, on the other hand, assert that only one hundred and seventy-three men were discharged, and all of these on specific charges. When the men were dismissed C. O. Pratt, national organizer, prepared at once for a trial of strength with the company. He ordered the men of his union to take the cars they were running back to the barns and not to go to work again until the company guaranteed the right of the men to belong to the union. Mr. Pratt declared, in a formal statement to the public, that the charge against the men dismissed was "belonging to the union." In addition he ordered the men not to take out a car until the company guaranteed twenty-five cents an hour pay. Pratt was the leader of the strike which tied up traffic in Philadelphia last June and has been a prominent figure ever since in railroading circles. The strike last June ended with a compromise of the subjects at issue, but neither the men nor the company which employed them have been really satisfied with the results. There was a great deal of rioting all through the strike in the Kensington district. There, on the first day, a crowd of over ten thousand strikers and their friends assembled and attacked six cars on Kensington Avenue. Bricks and stones hurtled against the cars, the poles were jerked from the trolley wires, and two of the cars were set on fire. The police were helpless, and a call was sent in and fire engines were soon rushing to the scene. The drivers sent their teams plunging forward through the mob, the firemen leaped to the ground and turned the hose first on the cars and then, when the rioters made a rush forward, the hosemen turned the water on the crowd, which seemed to have a cooling effect. Then reinforcements arrived, and a number of arrests were made.

Motorman Attacked by Strikers in the Kensington District

Boys in various parts of the city threw stones through car windows, and dozens of passengers were cut by flying glass. In fact, hardly a car passed Thirty-first and Dauphin Streets without being attacked. The strike being called at midday, thousands of people were compelled to run the gauntlet, as it were, to get home. During the subsequent days all the women who could remained at home.

Sunday was not a day of rest and quiet. Police patrols covered threatened points as best they could, but the crowds were too large and in too fierce a mood to be cowed by the bluecoats, of whom they generally stood in awe. Downtown there was not so much rioting, but in the suburban districts the day was one long series of bloody encounters. An

THE DEEP THINGS OF GOD

TEXT—I. Cor. 2 : 10

IF there is anything in this world that God hates it is sham. The word sham comes from the same root as the word shame, and that word meant originally a wound, something which caused pain; that is, a sham is something which ought to wound our sense of what is right and true, and it always does wound it when we have a clear and right perception of life. Christ never grew indignant, according to the Gospels, except when in the presence of the Scribes and Pharisees. It was hypocrisy, more than any other one sin, which aroused his anger. It was because his sense of what was right and true was opposed to that which was a superficial thing and a falsehood that his spirit rose up and cried out against the false.

The Divine Hatred of Sham

It is a first mark of the divine nature, from the very beginning, to hate all sham or superficial things. In the very act of creation God revealed his great love for "deep things." There are at least four distinct marks of the creation. First: It took a great deal of time; how long we do not know, but the periods called days were undoubtedly very long geological periods. It was not a superficial thing God was doing when he made the earth. Even his divine power could not, or did not, make it in a hurry. In the second place, the creation of the world caused gigantic effort; even God needed to rest after the six days. In the third place, the creation tended toward a great and dignified final purpose. It was not to show the divine power that God created the universe. It was to lead up to the creation of man and the establishment of him as a free-will being on the face of the earth. In the fourth place, the whole creation was good when it was finished, which is never true of anything which is a sham or which lies upon the surface.

If it is a mark of the divine being to hate the shams of life, it will not do us any harm to consider what a few of these shams are, as opposed to the deep things of God. There are a great many of these shams in our human life to-day. Among them we may note, first, the shams of society. Many young people wish to keep up with the foolish expenses of their own circle, even when they are not able to do so. It is probably true that hundreds of young men have bought expensive automobiles in this country, and run into debt for them. I know of a few instances, and doubtless there are very many more, where the desire to be in society leads to this exhibition of display and an outlay which cannot be afforded. A merchant told me that he had been unable to collect a small bill from a family which, nevertheless, finds the means to go away every summer on expensive vacations, and whose names figure largely in the column of persons who entertain, etc. Society is guilty of a sham philanthropy when it gives so-called charity balls, where more money is spent for dress, flowers, decoration and music, than is received for the poor, and this is called "charity," forsooth. There is also a sham politeness displayed by many people, who go through the outward forms, but lack the real kindness of heart. This is the veneering which Christ indignantly denounced when he spoke of the Scribes as being "whited sepulchres."

Shams in Education

In the second place, there are the shams which are sometimes connected with learning. Students sometimes wish to make a good showing with the least possible expense of time and thought. They devise methods by which they can pass examinations or make a good showing in the classroom. There is no real scholarship back of the apparent effort. It is significant also, in connection with some of the athletic phases of our college life, that there is danger of a sham atmosphere pervading places of learning where over-emphasis is given to a thing like athletics. The recent bequest to a college in Pennsylvania of a million dollars, on condition that the college give up all intercollegiate athletic sports, is a case in point. One of the students in this college, on being asked whether he thought the college ought to accept this gift, said, "No, it was worth a million dollars to down Pennsylvania in football." If that exaggerated sense of the importance of athletics should prevail to any extent in the college life of America it would represent a shallow definition of a college education.

Shams in Commercial Life

Third. There are the shams of deception in commercial life. The recent pure food law is revealing some of these shams. It is a great pity that the people have been deceived so long, or have deceived themselves, in the matter of patent medicines. If the whole list of patent medicines should forever be swallowed up in some bottomless pit, the American people would be far better off and happier than they are at present. The discovery has been made by the inspectors that some of these patent medicines contain from forty to sixty per cent. of opium or alcohol. In fact, they are nothing but intoxicants or opiates in disguise. What Christian people need to do is to adopt a healthy and Christian diet, renouncing all forms of dissipation (and Christian people are guilty of many), engage in wholesome, healthy, happy work for others, lead simple lives, and keep away from the drug store. In the commercial world is also much of the sham of so-called philanthropy. Men who have made their money by breaking the laws of the United States, who have selfishly broken the Golden Rule in business, who have driven their competitors out of business, give some of the money thus selfishly made to churches or hospitals or colleges, and point to themselves with pride as Christian philanthropists. This used to deceive the American people. It does not deceive them as much as it did, and it is sham philanthropy.

Fourth. There is also the sham of expecting to get something for nothing, which prevails in many parts of the country. Newspapers which ought to know better encourage this idea by advertising gifts for voting contests. In many Western towns the papers are continually asking the people to vote on the most popular man in town, or the prettiest school teacher, or the most popular streetcar conductor, the winner in the contest to get a piano, or a trip to Europe, or something else of great value for nothing. The whole principle is vicious, and should be opposed by all Christian people. It belongs to the sham of life.

Shams in Religious Life

There are also shams even in the religious world. Forms and ceremonies and rituals even take the place of the real heart life. The minister is supposed to preach and pray, and the choir to sing, some deceased brother right up into heaven, while the whole community knows as well as the minister and the choir that the deceased has lived anything but a heavenly life, and the whole thing is a mockery to all who hear, as well as to those who speak or sing. I have had families indignant at me because I would not declare a eulogy on a funeral occasion over a member of the family who had never been a Christian at all, had seldom attended church, and had been notorious for selfish and impure ways. The entire thing is a sham and a mockery and belongs to the things which God hates. There is also a more serious indictment to be brought against our religious life when it holds back what is due in the way of money and service. We call ourselves a Christian people. Members of churches give very meagerly compared to their means. I made a recent comparative study of the salaries of twenty ministers in a Western town with the salaries of twenty representative railroad men. The twenty ministers received an average of $950 each. The twenty railroad men received an average of $6,700 each. Five of these twenty railroad men were receiving $10,000 each. They were heads of departments, in very responsible positions. Of these twenty ministers fifteen had received no increase in salary in ten years' time. This great Christian nation spen $515,000,000 every year for tobacco, every cent which is worse than wasted; and it spends mo than a round $1,000,000,000 every year for toxicating drinks, $20,000,000 for chewing gu $25,000,000 for kid gloves, $15,000,000 for ostr feathers, and $10,000,000 all told, from all the d nominations, for foreign missions. If our relig is worth what we say it is, we are getting it ve cheap. If we could get all the money that is spe by church members for useless amusements, that amusements which are not necessary for health, could double the salary of every minister and sch teacher in the United States. I say it is a sh religion and a sham Christianity which is willing spend less for its Christian activities than for amusements and indulgences of life.

Seek the "Deep Things" of God

Now, over against all these sham things of l stand the deep things of God, and it is the de things of God that we as Christian people are urg to seek after. Before we can get them we m have a right definition of life. We are here in t world to do the will of God. That is our first bu ness. We are not here to build railroads, or s scraping cities, or factories, or make money, as first business of life; and we are here, first of all seek the kingdom of God, and then if we need other things they will follow after. It is a gr thing for a human being when he has discove what the essentials of life are, and sweeps the ur sential out. With this definition we can ask, W are the deep things of God? Among the very fi we could put the love of humanity. The great thing about God is love, and it is not an abstr thing, but concrete. It is the love of men, and get very close to the deep things of God when also love men. Among the deep things of God n be mentioned also his great redemptive power. we have faith in that, we can do great things him and with him. The world needs the healing redemptive power of God more than anything e and the Church of Christ needs to search after t power, which can be obtained through faith. this knowledge of the deep things of God is the w of the Spirit of God, and it cannot be obtained exc by the spiritual sense. Coming home from Eur a man died on our steamer when it was in midoc

The Call of the Spirit

The next day the widow went to the officers of ship and asked if they could not send word to relatives, who lived in New York. The wireless strument was set to work. It flashed the mess over hundreds of miles of water, through the and against the wind. The relatives received word, and telegraphed back to the woman that message had been received. This would have b absolutely impossible if the instrument on the s and the instrument in the steamship office had been in tune. They were made to answer each ot It is thus with the spirit of man. It must be se tive to the spirit of God for free communica between the two. Does your spirit respond to call of the world as it cries aloud to you, beckon you to ambition, or to pleasure, or to sin, or your spirit respond to the Spirit of God? Spiritu things are spiritually examined. It is well for Church of Christ in this country to examine it whether it is thus searching after the deep thing God, or whether it is satisfied with the sham superficial, and it will not be until the Christia of America is the Christianity of Christ. It will be until we have turned from the shallow and em things of life to "the deep things of God" that can expect to make great the kingdom of God in life of this nation. The needs of America ar great, its passions and sins and selfishness ar monumental, that nothing less than the deep thi of God in the hearts of his people can bring al individual and social regeneration and save republic for the good of the world and the gl of God.

He Cares for Me

I AM only a little sparrow—
A bird of low degree;
My life is of little value,
But the dear Lord cares for me.

He gives me a coat of feathers;
It is very plain, I know,
With never a speck of crimson,
But it was not made for show.

It keeps me warm in winter,
And it shields me from the rain;
Were it bordered with gold or purple,
Perhaps it might make me vain.

If my food is sometimes scanty,
Close picking makes it sweet;
I've always enough to feed me,
And life is more than meat.

I fly through the thickest forest;
I alight on many a spray;
I've neither chart or compass,
But I never lose my way.

I'm only a little sparrow—
A bird of low degree;
But I know the dear Lord loves me;
Dost thou know His love for thee?

The Lonely Elderly Woman

AN English paper announces that fifty flats for ladies are in process f erection in London. They are not or the rich, but are to be rented at a w figure and are designed for wom-n, especially elderly women, of good irth and education, who are com-elled to earn their living. The rent r one of these little apartments will e placed as low as nine shillings per eek—about $2. A central dining-all and social drawing-room are pro-ided, where the tenants, under a roper management, can meet each her and form pleasant friendships. uch an enterprise would be a positive essing to many worthy women in ew York and other large cities here. Almost any one of us knows several omen between fifty and seventy years age, well-born and delicately reared, hom the vicissitudes of life have rced into our shops and offices to rn a living. Depending often upon anty salaries, and either without mily friends or with only such as e unable to help them, these gentle dies are often obliged to live in small, heerless rooms. Rents are too high permit them to occupy a regular partment of their own; and yet they ould love to have such a home. They e still able to work. They could anage to keep up a little home. But ne is available, except at prohibitive rices.

"At this present moment," says our rrespondent, "I know two women, th of them between fifty and sixty ears of age, who are wishing for just ch a quiet, safe, inexpensive retreat s this English apartment house. If nly some benefactor would arise to ild one or more, and possibly to en-w them sufficiently, so that in times stress rent might be provided free r certain tenants!"

She suggests that the building might isely be built around three sides of a uare, and only two rooms deep, so as give plenty of light. Each tenement uld consist of three or four rooms, ith ample closets, and conveniences r those who wish to do their own oking and laundry work; and cites veral cases which she has known of omen to whom such a house would ve been "an inestimable boon."

The idea sounds sane and practical, d may well be pondered by our phil-thropic workers.

BIBLE SAINTS

By Rev. J. M. FARRAR, D.D.*

WHO are saints? If this were one of your examination questions how many of you could answer it? One boy holds up his hands; he says: "Saints are a—well, saints are the—why, saints are saints." A little girl says saints are very holy men with a ring of light round their heads. The dictionary says: "Saints are holy or godly persons." Sometimes we go to the dictionary when we ought to go to the Bible. What answer does the Bible give? The Bible word that tells the meaning of saint is the one you are almost sure to miss in your spelling lesson. The word is "separate." Saints are people who are separated from those who do not love and obey God.

NEXT Thursday, March 17, is St. Patrick's Day. You are smiling, and I know you are thinking of something that girls run from and that boys like to kill. Behind the smile and the snakes the real St. Patrick has been lost. He did not drive the snakes from Ireland. He did something better than that. Do you want to know some facts about St. Patrick, and about what he did? He was born in Britain, and was of noble birth. When he was about fifteen years old, at his father's country place, he was seized by pirates and carried to Ireland and sold to strangers. He was kept in slavery for six years. After he escaped to his home in Britain, he tells us that he heard a voice in his mind. It was "the voice of the Irish," and it said: "We pray thee, holy youth, to come and henceforward walk among us." He separated himself from his home and friends and went to Ireland to preach Christ. This separation made him a Bible saint.

ST. PATRICK lived in the fifth century. We are living in the twentieth century. At that time all the people on the Emerald Isle were heathen and worshiped idols. They had not so much as heard there was a Christ. The slave boy's life was noble and good, and his "intense faith" drew the people to him. They knew there was a God, but did not know he had sent Christ with good news for our world. Shall I tell you how these heathen tried to get a message from God? The man who wanted to get the message would take the skin off a ram or goat, and wrap himself in the skin, that had the warm blood on it. Then he would run to a stream or waterfall and there lie down and sleep. He believed that while, by the side of the running water, he slept in this skin, his idol would talk to him and give him a message from God. His dream was his Bible.

ST. PATRICK had, while a boy, learned of Christ, and now saw how foolish these strange heathen customs were. He spent the remainder of his life preaching Christ to these people. He was what we call to-day a missionary. By his life and hard work he won the people from idolatry and taught them to learn the will of God from Christ. Do I hear some of you say: "How could one man convert a whole island from heathenism and change idol worshipers into Christians?" We do not have to go back to the fifth century to answer this question. I will tell you a story more wonderful than the story of the conversion of the island of Ireland.

THE Rev. Dr. John G. Paton, who for forty years was a missionary to the South Sea Islands, spoke at one time in New York about his work. He told us that when he went to the South Sea Islands the people were heathen. They had never heard of Christ. One of his most interesting stories is about the well he dug. On the island there were weeks and weeks when it did not rain. During the dry season they drank the milk of the cocoanuts—as long as it lasted. Then they would go to their idols and pray for rain. Poor people, with tongues hot from thirst, praying to dumb idols to send them rain! When the "rain-god" delayed his answer to their prayers, there was great suffering.

THERE had been no rain for several weeks, the cocoanuts were all gone, and the people were dying from thirst. Dr. Paton told them he was going down into the earth for rain. The people had never seen fresh water except as it came from the clouds. How could clouds be found in the earth? Dr. Paton prayed to God to help him, and then began to dig a hole in the ground. The savages supposed he was crazy. All he could persuade them to do was to pull a windlass-rope and draw up the loosened earth as he sank the well deeper and deeper. If he found fresh water they would believe he was telling the truth about Christ. If he failed, they would not believe him and would probably kill him.

AFTER going down thirty feet he struck a spring. Down on his knees he fell, praying, tasting the water at the same time. It was pure, fresh water. The people drank and their parched tongues were cooled. The effect was magical. The man they had laughed at was now a "prophet." He had said he would go down in the ground to "find rain," and now the people believed that all he told them about Jehovah and Jesus Christ was true. Ask your teacher to tell you the story of how the heathen in the South Sea Islands believed in Dr. Paton's God, destroyed their idols, built churches and schools, accepted God's laws and were changed from cannibals into Christians. This story will help you to understand some of the wonderful things we are told about the great missionary, St. Patrick.

A Notable Japanese Pastor

MISSIONARY William E. Lampe, of Sendai, Japan, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD acknowledging the receipt of contributions by readers of this journal, to be applied in furtherance of his missionary work. He says:

"After earnest thought as to how it might be best applied, I have decided to send it to Sendai, Japan, for the benefit of Mr. Chikaharu Akiho, his family and his work. Mr. Akiho became a Christian more than twenty years ago, while in a normal school. His parents bitterly opposed his becoming a Christian, inasmuch as they could not understand why he should wish to take such a step. Soon after accepting the Christian faith, he decided to devote himself to the propagation of Christianity as his lifework. He has for more than fifteen years been one of the ablest and most faithful native pastors in all of north Japan. His salary has usually been $10 to $12 per month, and it may readily be seen what this has involved in order that he might be able to support a family of five children, but he has been willing to endure all for the sake of the Gospel. He is now pastor of one of the most active congregations in the city of Sendai, which has a population of more than 100,000. His present salary, even while pastor of that city congregation, is $16.50 a month. His two sons will follow in the footsteps of their father and enter the Christian ministry. Both have graduated from the North Japan College, a mission school, under the care of the Reformed Church in the United States, and are now studying theology, and will soon begin their active ministry. The oldest daughter is now in a Christian Girls' School, and will soon be doing the work of a Bible woman. I do not know of an instance where $10 can be better used than to assist in the work of this family, which is doing more than very many families in the homeland, to help build up the kingdom of God in the earth."

CONGRESS AND THE COST OF LIVING

SENATE'S SPECIAL COMMITTEE BEGINS INVESTIGATION OF THE PRESENT HIGH PRICES

THE legislative branch of the United States Government has entered upon what it is promised shall be a thorough and exhaustive investigation into the causes of the increased cost of living in this country. Vice-President James S. Sherman, presiding officer of the Senate, appointed a special committee of that body to consider this specific subject. This special committee will probably conclude its inquiry during the current session of Congress—before mid-summer at the latest—although it is realized that this will necessitate energetic work owing to the wide scope of the investigation.

Many of our readers may have seen references in the newspapers, during the past few weeks, to an investigation of the all-absorbing topic of the present cost of living by a group of Representatives. This earlier activity has been merely a prelude to the broader treatment of the subject which is now proposed. The earlier investigation has been held by a sub-committee of the District of Columbia Committee of the United States House of Representatives, and has concerned itself only with the exceptionally high cost of living in the city of Washington—a sore subject with Congressmen and other compulsory residents of the Capital City. The Senate investigation is to concern itself not with one section, but with the conditions of life in all parts of the country, and even with foreign influences as exerted upon American food and raiment.

When the suggestion was first made for a Senate investigation, the proposal first contemplated turning the searchlight upon the causes of high prices of the more elementary necessaries of life. Gradually, however, substitute resolutions and amendments were presented in the Senate, until the measure as finally adopted called for a most sweeping search for facts. The special committee will endeavor to ascertain to what extent prices have advanced during the past ten years and the cause of such increase. Incidentally, it will go into the subject of salaries and wages in the different occupations, to ascertain whether incomes have increased proportionately to the advance in the cost of living. The investigation is not to deal merely with surface conditions, as reflected by retail prices in the stores and markets all over the country; but will follow the various commodities back to farm and factory, with a view to learning the exact sources of the additions to the ultimate prices, and determining the relative responsibility of producers, cold-storage interests, wholesalers, jobbers, commission merchants or other middlemen, and retailers.

It is stated in the instructions given to the special committee that the investigators must be attentive to clothing, boots and shoes, and "all commodities," even to steel. From the very nature of things, the investigation ought to go pretty deeply into the subject of tariff regulation and its effect upon prices. Such an inquiry ought to have more or less significance as a verdict upon the influence of the new tariff regulations. This explains the keen concern felt in political circles as to the personnel of the special committee and the leanings of the respective members as advocates or opponents of the existing tariff law.

The U. S. Senate Committee to Investigate the Cost of Living

Senator Henry Cabot Lodge of Massachusetts, appointed chairman of the Special Committee, is an ardent advocate of the present tariff. He delivered addresses in the Senate recently denying that the new tariff is to blame for the high prices of food and clothing. Senator J. H. Gallinger of New Hampshire, another member of the committee, is also a believer in the existing tariff, and two of the other Republican members, Senator Reed Smoot of Utah and Senator P. J. McCumber of North Dakota, are likewise accounted "regulars" on this issue. The fifth Republican on the committee, Senator G. L. Crawford of South Dakota, is said to hold "progressive" sentiments on the tariff, notwithstanding that he voted for the Payne measure. The two Democrats on the committee, Senator F. M. Simmons of North Carolina and Senator James P. Clarke of Arkansas, are opposed, in the main, to high tariff duties.

Experts will be employed in the investigation; and the committee is empowered to send for papers and persons needed in the taking of testimony, to examine witnesses under oath, and to employ such stenographers and clerks as may be necessary. It is not expected that the committee will travel about the country, as some Congressional committees have done, holding sessions in the principal cities. All the work it is expected, can be done in Washington, by summoning to the capital such witnesses as may be needed.

In anticipation of this Senatorial investigation, the two departments having the greatest knowledge of price fluctuations and market conditions—the Department of Agriculture and Department of Commerce and Labor—set about the compilation of detailed data on the subject. Now the officials have ready at hand an immense amount of valuable information to lay before the investigators. Mr. E. T. Clark, secretary to the new committee, is a good choice for this responsible place. He has served as clerk of the Senate Committee on the Philippines and is well qualified to handle the mass of detail that will be involved.

attempt was made by the company to run cars, but before the afternoon was over they sent back what they could rescue to the barns.

Philadelphia has a police force of a little over three thousand, and they seemed utterly helpless before the crowds which surged menacingly up and down the streets looking for trouble. The fact that two policemen were riding on the front platform of a car seemed to give added zest to stone throwing, the leaders being able, after a discharge of missiles, to escape into the throng behind, which closed about them and made their arrest difficult, if not impossible.

Mayor Reyburn realized that he was dealing with a critical situation, and authorized the Director of Public Safety, Henry Clay, to enlist four thousand extra policemen, thus bringing the available force up to seven thousand.

Strike Leader Pratt was in close touch with John Murphy, the head of the Central Labor Union, and it was soon noised about that Murphy would call a sympathetic strike of every union man in Philadelphia if non-union men were put on the cars.

A large number of children were injured in the riots. One little girl, standing on a doorstep, was hit in the side by a stray bullet. A little boy of eleven was riding in a Franklinville car which was stormed by several hundred rioters. All of the passengers dropped to the floor and tried to protect themselves from the flying bricks and the glass which came down on their heads and faces in showers. A stone hit the little fellow on the side of the head, injuring him fatally. One mob was threatening the lines of the firemen putting out a conflagration when up came eight automobiles filled with policemen, led by fighting Tim O'Leary, superintendent of police. They formed a giant wedge, charged at double-time and drove into the mob, striking right and left. The street was soon cleared and the firemen saved.

In the Kensington district by Monday a large number of barricades were erected across the street, and the place looked like a battlefield. Here the company gave up first of all, as things were growing rapidly worse and it was almost sure death to send a man through on a car platform. Strike Leader Pratt was placed under arrest, charged with inciting riot, but this seemed to have little effect. At last, when the police seemed powerless, the mounted State constabulary were sent for, "men who do not carry bouquets in their guns." Quietly, determinedly they, a mere handful, rode into the city of turmoil, and the place knew the first sense of relief for several days. There is one person all Pennsylvania knows cannot be fooled with, and that is a trooper of the constabulary. The strike is still on as this edition goes to press.

Policemen Arresting Stone-Throwers

ROOSEVELT IN THE SOUDAN

opyright by Underwood & Underwood

Mrs. Roosevelt and Her Daughter Ethel

AFTER several months in the African bush, and living the care-free and happy life of the hunter and naturalist, where Congressmen ase from troubling and politics are at rest, Colo- l Roosevelt has packed up his guns and the equip- ent of his expedition and has turned to that other ie of work, writing, for which he has always had pronounced taste and in which he won distinction fore he became a leading figure in our national e. He has used, it is true, pen and pencil at inter- ls during his stay in the African forests, sending ck vivid accounts of his journey, of days in camp d in the hunting field, to one of our American agazines. At present, however, he is actively en- ged on a series of addresses and lectures, which ll not deal with African life, but with various litical and social subjects. These lectures will be livered in part before the University of Paris, in rlin, at Oxford, England, and one undoubtedly Stockholm, Sweden. He will deliver the address the latter place as one of the recipients of the obel Peace Prize, Mr. Roosevelt having received e prize as the result of his efforts to bring Japan d Russia together and end the war in Manchuria. When Mr. Roosevelt laid down the cares of his fice he was too active in body and too young in irit to rest in the ordinary way. Change was rest ough for him, and when he started for Africa he as enthusiastic over the trip he was about to take; t the wiseacres and long-faced prophets of evil agged their heads and prophesied that Mr. Roose- lt would ruin his health, be killed by natives, or se his life in a conflict with some wild animal. hose who saw the Ex-President the other day wire at they never saw him looking better or more bust. The natives treated him like a king, and r generations will tell of the prowess of the great ief who formerly ruled over a great people, but ho was so fond of the chase that he passed the job er to some one else and camped and roughed it in way to arouse their enthusiasm. As for the wild imal scare, that seems to have exploded along ith the shells in the Roosevelt guns. Probably no unter of recent years, since the time of Sir Samuel aker, has ever brought back such a large and varied collection of specimens. These are to be placed in the Smithsonian Institution at Washington and in other museums of which the natural history division is made a prominent feature. The Harvard Club of New York, which already has the nucleus of a fine collection of game heads, will probably receive one or two specimens.

Mr. Roosevelt had an expert taxidermist with him, and did not wait until his return to civilization before sending on a large number of his trophies to America. Some of them have already arrived in Washington, and have been mounted, ready to be placed in their proper place in the collection in Washington. These specimens, it may be remarked, have no card or inscription attached to show that they fell to the rifle of a former President. This may be done later, however, as the visitors to the collection will naturally want to know what specimens were sent by Colonel Roosevelt.

The great hunting expedition was really over when the party reached Gondokoro, in the Soudan, and it was a great day for the town when the expedition made its entry and proceeded to the river. It was as picturesque a reception as the British officials and the inhabitants could devise, for a man of world-wide fame very seldom gets into that part of the world, a trip up the Nile satisfying most noted tourists. The reception lacked nothing in the way of noise, odd costume and sincerity to be rated as a complete success. Its cordiality was a great surprise to the party of hunters, for while they expected a friendly greeting they did not expect to be made the central figures in a triumphal procession.

A large party of natives, under the command of Chief Kereba, went out on the road a distance of sixteen miles to act as an escort of honor. The native band went with him, and they made the air discordant or harmonious, according to the point of view. They had large brass horns and plenty of drums.

When the Roosevelt party reached the outskirts of Gondokoro the trumpeters of the band jammed the horns into their mouths with a "now is the time" and a "do it or die" sort of expression, the first notes of "America" rent the air, and the parade started into town. Just behind the drummers, who were sticking steadfastly to the role they had to play, came a big African porter, carrying a large American flag. Following in order came Colonel Roosevelt, Kermit Roosevelt, and the American hunters and scientists of the Smithsonian Institution. After these came the caravan, a long line of gun-bearers, porters carrying baggage, and the men and boys required to do the rough work around the camps.

The native part of the caravan was fully alive to the importance of the expedition, and marched along enjoying to the full the envious glances of the people of the place, who lined the road and fell in behind as soon as the last burden-bearer had passed. The column marched down to the river, where a launch, belonging to Sir Reginald Wingate of the Egyptian army, was waiting. The American flag was flying from the stern of the boat, and a large quantity of mail was waiting for the party.

Colonel Roosevelt, his son, and Heller, the zoologist, took one trip, lasting a week, up the river, while the rest of the party busied themselves with packing up the outfits and paying off the escort. The three embarked on the steamer Redjaf and were accompanied by a launch belonging to the Belgian government. Hardly had the cheers of the crowd on the dock died away before both vessels struck a sandbar and were hard aground. The steamer managed to get off, but the launch held fast.

While here Kermit Roosevelt showed that he had the same fearlessness which has been one of his father's most prominent characteristics. A native had been working about the deck of a near-by boat. He lost his footing, fell overboard and was drowned. Kermit and Mr. Heller both dived into the water—first with the hope of saving the man, and, when this was found to be impossible, to bring up the body. The river is full of crocodiles, which have killed many a bold swimmer before this, but the two men plunged in and disappeared beneath the surface of the turbid stream. They soon came up, and, finding that their efforts were in vain, climbed back on the deck.

Colonel Roosevelt will make a formal visit to Belgian territory in Africa, and then return to be received by British officials and the Khedive at Khartoum. He will meet Mrs. Roosevelt and his daughter Ethel, who sailed a short time ago from New York for Egypt. There will be an imposing reception in this historic city and a number of other festivities. They will be entertained at the Governor's palace. They will accompany him on his extended tour about the Continent, then to England and home. Preparations for receiving Colonel Roosevelt when he once more sets foot in his native land are now being suggested.

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—Ex-U. S. Senator Blair's article on another ge, in which he urges a union of all the forces Temperance, is sound logic and deserves a ide reading.

—The Christian Herald, in pursuance of its olicy of presenting both sides of every great ublic question, gives elsewhere in this issue the ther side" of the high-price problem, from the andpoint of an intelligent, practical farmer and ock-raiser, who sets forth what he and his class lieve to be the real cause of the increased cost living.

—Dr. Arthur J. Smith has lately been con- ucting a simultaneous mission at St. John, ew Brunswick, being the concluding services an evangelistic tour covering over five onths. Under his superintendence evangel- tic campaigns, with union meetings of nearly l churches, have been held with remarkable ccess in Kane, Pa.; Elmira, N. Y.; Law- nce, Mass., and South Framingham.

—Missionary E. H. Richards, M. E. Mis- on, Inhambane, Africa, writes: "Our mission just now in receipt of $18 from some un- own friend, via The Christian Herald (un- own to us, but not to the Master), and we turn our heartiest thanks. Also, thanks for e $35 from several other donors, through ur paper. I am still at work proof-reading r new Sheetswa Bible. We are now in Jere- iah, and hope to have the reading completed y May 1. This will be the first production of e Bible in this tongue."

—Rev. Peyton Stevens writes, saying: "The new missionary home at Chefoo, China, in charge of Rev. J. A. Stooke and wife, has been a boon to missionaries of every denomination, as well as Y. M. C. A. and Christian workers, who are accommodated at the home at cost. It is one of the most beautiful sanitariums in the East. Your readers have helped in this work, but there is still a debt on the home." Mr. Stevens has been a missionary for sixteen years in China.

—Secretary T. A. Bailey, of the mission to lepers in India, writes that Miss Mary Reed is still pushing her work in Chandag among the poor lepers and is meeting with great encouragement. A converted leper in one of the asylums in an Indian province, hearing of the spiritual darkness of the inmates of a distant asylum, volunteered to go and give them the Gospel and "to live and die for them." This is a fine illustration of Christian heroism among a people usually regarded as one of the most degraded in the East.

—A novel experiment in church work is about to be made by the Presbyterians in New York. The old Fourteenth Street Presbyterian Church is to be turned into a "labor temple," with Rev. G. E. Merriam and Rev. J. M. Hoadley as associate pastors, and the Rev. Charles Stelzle in general charge. There will be a corps of workers, paid and voluntary. A special appeal will be made to the interests of the laboring class, and a workingmen's mass meeting will be held every Sunday afternoon, which will be a forum for speakers on labor, social and economic questions.

—Missionary Emily S. Hartwell, of Foochow, China, writes: "You will be glad to hear that The Christian Herald Interdenominational Fukhien Industrial Homes, which have been made possible through the generosity of The Christian Herald, have rented a tea 'hong,' which they have fitted up temporarily for about one hundred boys. The list of two hundred children we expect to take in is being filled with the greatest care, selecting only the most destitute. The superintendent, Mr. Li Chi Fan, is a consecrated, able Chinese, and is proving very efficient. The girls we will arrange to take in later."

—Miss Josephine Cowgill, a missionary to Africa, writes from Port Said to Mr. J. C. Havemeyer, of New York, giving an interesting description of a school for Mohammedan girls in that city, which is in charge of two very earnest Christian missionaries from California. This work has been in operation eight years. In addition to the Gospel, there are various studies and industrial work, sewing, etc. Mrs. Richardson and Miss Triplett, the missionaries, are helped by four native teachers. All are poorly paid and the work is greatly hampered by lack of room. Miss Cowgill also tells of the great need of Christian workers in many of the nearby villages. Some touching appeals have been made for missionaries to be sent to these neglected places.

—Missionary William C. Terril, Superintendent of the M. E. Mission, Inhambane, East Africa, writes: "We have now 71 mission out-stations, in charge of the same number of native evangelists. We have on these out-stations 1,783 members and probationers, also 1,117 children in our day schools and over 1,300 pupils in the Sunday School. The fact that cheers our hearts the most is that we have 3,000 heathen in regular attendance each day at our prayer services. We need help to reach these people and bring them to the light of the Gospel. Their hearts are seeking after the real Saviour. If we do not point them to Christ soon, Mahomet will win them, for his followers are busy, while we are tied and able to do but little. Fully 30 of our 71 evangelists are working without any help from the mission, because we have not the means to help them. We plead for help for these in order that the work may go on uninterruptedly."

Strikes and the Public

AT this writing one of the worst streetcar strikes in American industrial history is in progress. It has been characterized by scenes of violence abhorrent to the mind of the majority of Americans who love law and order. As to the causes of the strike the carmen's union tell one story and the company another. Strike Leader Pratt claims that the company formed a rival union in order to weaken the one to which the majority of the men belonged, and that men were discharged by the hundred for being union men. This the company denies, saying that those dropped had been taken off the list of employees for the good of the service. A demand has also been made for an advance of pay, but this does not seem to be of such importance in the eyes of the strikers as the preservation intact of the Amalgamated Association.

Through the entire conflict of interests the welfare of the general public, which as a mere matter of majority is the greatest of all, seems to have been disregarded by both sides. The American people are, as a general thing, fair-minded. If the union had a just case they would have been glad to have its grievance rectified. If the company was endeavoring to serve the public fairly and treat its men fairly, then they would like equally well to have that made clear. As matters stand now the various issues on which the strike was made have become dimmed in the mind of the average Philadelphian, who is compelled to walk five miles to his work.

Reports from the erstwhile City of Brotherly Love show that the innocent bystanders and the passengers on the cars have received more injuries than strikers, policemen and car operators, consequently the public is heartily sick of the situation, is not taking sides, but is very anxious to have something done to have permanent peace in the streets and feel that life and limb are not in jeopardy every time one turns a corner and finds himself in the vicinity of a trolley car.

Now that things have reached such a pass order must, of course, be restored, and then steps can be taken to settle the difficulty which seems chronic between the railway company and a large part of its men. But things should never have been allowed to reach the present condition of riot and bloodshed. The public is beginning to demand, in no uncertain tone, that its rights be respected by all parties. Tens of thousands must use the cars to get to their work. A difference of opinion as to wages or of affiliation should not be allowed to tie up the traffic of a great city. This paper has urged the establishment of labor courts, to which such differences should be submitted, either party being entitled to bring in a case.

Wrenching the Constitution

WE regret to note the signs of a renewal of the agitation for the exclusion of the Bible from the public schools. Advocates of exclusion point to the Constitution, which they pronounce prohibitive of all religious exercises in public institutions, claiming that it applies to the Bible as much as it would apply to Confucianism, Buddhism, or any other religion. Startling results of this loose method of construction are apparent in many quarters. In Bridgeport, Pa., the local school board became dead-locked on a resolution to prohibit the reading of the Bible in the schools, and a district judge very sensibly ousted the board and ordered a new election. We have a similar and wholly needless tangle in New York and other cities, at frequent intervals. This is a grotesque misconstruction of the sole passage in the Constitution which has any bearing on the subject of religion, and which should be made familiar to all. It is the first of the amendments, and says: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech," etc.

Nothing was further from the purpose of the founders of this government than to prohibit the free exercise of religion; but they did desire to prevent the establishment of a "state religion"—that union of church and State which, in many lands, has exerted a baneful and oppressive influence, destructive of human liberty. Our forefathers saw the evil effects such a union had produced in Italy, Spain, Portugal, France, Russia and Great Britain, and they were resolved that in this free country there should be no religious establishment supported, even partially, by the Federal Government. It was far from their purpose to exclude religion from public places or functions; least of all did they object to the use of the Bible and of Christian prayer on such occasions, for it is a matter of recorded history that in our first Congress, prayer was a duty reverently and regularly performed, as is done to-day; in the earliest days of our Army and Navy, there were Christian chaplains, and in our pioneer schools Bible reading and prayer were daily duties. Congress in the Constitution aimed at the widest national religious liberty, and it is due in large measure to this privilege that our country has become a great and progressive nation—a nation of whose religious beliefs three great tribunals, the United States Supreme Court and the Supreme Courts of New York and Pennsylvania, have officially declared that "Christianity is part and parcel of the common law of the land." This is the highest and most authoritative construction, and should be kept steadily in view whenever we find men who would strain and wrench the Constitution in the effort to square it with their own narrow, bigoted opinions, in the effort to prohibit that freedom of action and belief which the Constitution declares should not be prohibited.

Hereafter, let us hear no more of constitutional prohibition when discussing the question of the Bible in the public schools. Wholly apart from its inspiration and the sublime religious truths it reveals, it is the greatest historical book in the world, and it should be studied in every school and college, if not for its religion, at least for its historic, philosophic and poetic value. Let us remember that there is nothing in the Constitution prohibitive of religion, but rather provision for its free exercise. It sets up a barrier, however, so that there shall never be in this free land a state religion, lest some day it should join hands with a tyrannous government in oppressing the people.

The Senate Investigation

IT is a comprehensive plan of investigation which the Special Senate Committee on the cost of living has mapped out for itself, and one that will in all probability occupy the entire summer. So many matters must obviously come within the scope of this inquiry that it will be impossible to do more than deal with the most urgent features—those that are related more closely to the production, sale and consumption of the necessaries of life. Incidentally, we may expect to see an instructive light shed upon the inner workings of the great packing companies, which now apparently control the market at both ends—the farmer and stock-raiser on the one hand, and the retailer on the other. Among the retailers the cry now is that "the trusts get all the money." Whether this be true or not, the public is certainly the ultimate sufferer, and the producer does not now stand in the light of a special beneficiary either. We may expect to see the limelight thrown strongly on the part played by the railroads, too. Some little illumination may also enable us to judge of the importance of another cause of high prices—the growing tendency to national extravagance in our domestic habits. If we could establish a true perspective we might see just how far we have traveled from the simplicity and frugality of our ancestors, and to what extent, therefore, we are ourselves responsible for present conditions. In this view the investigation may prove a valuable lesson to our people.

The Highest Heroism

ALL the world knows the story of the terrible mine disaster at Cherry, Illinois, but not till now has the true tale been made known of those heroes who gave their lives voluntarily in the work of rescue. Edith Wyatt tells of them in McClure's Magazine. It is a tale that will awaken the admiration and wonder of all who read it.

There were ten of those humble heroes who yielded up their lives in the work of rescue. Thes are the names: Dominick Formento, Robert Clar John Bundy, Alexander Nourberg, Henry Stewar Andrew McCluky, Isaac Lewis, James Spears, Joh Zabriske and John Flood. All of them deserve to be remembered. All of the ten were burne alive in the mine, which had become a roaring fu nace. It was a forlorn hope which they had unde taken; it was almost certain death. Yet they di not hesitate, but down they went in the hot and flan ing cage, some of them falling unconscious on th downward journey, others dropping suffocated c the bottom, to be charred almost to cinders in th withering blast. Some of them were taken out dea and disfigured, poor blackened, distorted remnan of humanity; more than half of them were neve found, and their weeping relatives did not even hav the poor satisfaction of giving their bodies decen burial. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has already to the story of the mining heroes at Cherry. It ha related how William Cleland, one of the impri oned miners, sang and prayed with his mates ar bade them be of good courage and trust in God f deliverance. But the tale would be incomplete wit out the story of the heroic ten, of whom it may we be said, "Greater love hath no man than thi that a man lay down his life for his friends."

Good Companionship

WE are judged largely by our associations, ar it is right that it should be so, for associatio is one of the greatest character moulders. "A ma is known by the company he keeps," says the pro erb. When the Young Men's Christian Associatio was started in Paris, many years ago, a strange was often noticed at the meetings. Always h came in after the meeting began and left before closed. They wondered who the mysterious ma was. At length one put himself in the stranger way, and asked him to join them. Then he said, ' will tell you who I am; I am a detective. The go ernment is afraid of conspirators and spies, ar watches every meeting in Paris. I know all abo every one of your members. I know every thin you do by day and by night. There is not a con pany of young men like this in Paris. I have to the government that your behavior is faultless, ar that you are a credit to the country." What splendid testimony for Christianity and for goo companionship was that! John the apostle had r detectives at work, but he kept his eyes on his chi dren, and inquired about them when he could n see them, so that he was able to say with joy of or of them, "Demetrius hath good report of all men Every young man who seeks only good Christia companionship is a Demetrius, walking in the ligh working by it and sleeping by it, and with none t make him afraid.

Railway in the Air

THERE have been constructed in recent years, in both Europe and America, a large number of mountain railways, and tourists are able to go to the lofty peaks of famous mountains in the compartment of a steam car. While this was very comfortable, the traveler often lost some of the finest views for which he had taken the trip, as the road had to take the easiest ascent and consequently the least picturesque. Now a new way of mountain travel has been inaugurated in Switzerland, on the Grindelwald in the Bernese Oberland. It was devised by the celebrated inventor, Strubb, of Zurich. A wire has been stretched from the foot of the mountain, across crags and glaciers, to a high, rocky plateau. An open car, much like the basket of a balloon, is attached to the wire track and is pulled rapidly through the air, but without rocking to an alarming extent. No more than two passengers could go up in the same car. People with weak hearts and lungs are advised to go by the safer road up the side of the mountain. There is no real danger, but it takes strong nerves to find one traveling along on a single wire, of which one can see neither the starting point or the end. The sensation is exactly like that of rising in a balloon, though always at an angle. Doubtless a great many adventurous Americans will take the trip this summer. This new mastery of man over the forces of nature, this added opportunity to view and be inspired with the greatness of God's handiwork in the sublimity of the mountain scenes, suggest the part the mountains are to take in the chorus of Christ's coming and salvation, as described by the prophet:

The mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing. (Isa. 55: 12.)

Bird Paradise

Mr. John D. Rockefeller is very fond of birds and other pets. His wife also has a great love for them. On their estate of 10,000 acres at Pocantico Hills he has laid out a large feeding ground for his birds; on tall trees cages for pigeons and other birds have been placed, while there is a separate building for hundreds of pheasants, partridges, and feathered creatures of all colors. Eighteen hundred partridges arrived at this bird paradise the other day, and joined thousands of others that had been brought before them from foreign lands on the tank steamers of the Standard Oil Company, that return from every foreign shore; and multitudes more are to be added. Mr. and Mrs. Rockefeller walk through their park, feeding these beautiful creatures, who come at their call, and who seem to know and love those who have made such careful provision for them. The vast numbers and infinite variety of the pets in the bird paradise at the "Boxwood Home" at Pocantico Hills suggest the feathered creatures that were taken into the ark:

Every fowl after his kind, every bird of every sort. (Gen. 7: 14).

Female Dueling

A duel between two girl students took place the other day at Presterlitz, a small village close to the Austrian frontier. The young ladies, who were studying medicine at Cracow, had fallen in love with a young medical student named Breitner, who made love to both of them in turn and did not engage himself to either. Competition for his affections led to an exchange of blows. They considered that the rule of chivalry required an appeal to the "code." Consequently Ilonca Ilnetsky, who received the first blow, challenged Olga Metzeroff, who struck her, sending two other girl students as seconds. The girl challenged selected two girl students as seconds, and the place of the duel was fixed in German territory to evade the Austrian law. Arrangements were made for pistol shots at fifteen paces. At the fifth shot Olga Metzeroff, being wounded in the left shoulder, fell fainting in the snow. Two medical students bandaged the wounds and carried her back to her home. It is said that Ilonca Ilnetsky, the victor, was greeted as a heroine by her fellow-students. If a killing had been proper under any circumstance, which was not the case, the two girls should have turned their guns upon the miserable scoundrel that betrayed them both, rather than be guilty of the supreme folly and crime of becoming each a suicide and murderer in consenting to the disgraceful duel. Now, when men are giving up dueling as a relic of barbarism, rather than an expression of chivalry, seems a poor time for women to give such a public exhibition of insane jealousy and murderous hate, as in the contest just fought. The demon that provoked the fight between these girls is described in Solomon's Song:

Jealousy is cruel as the grave: the coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame. (Solomon's Song 8: 6.)

Artificial Sapphires

Maiden Lane is astir over the appearance of artificial sapphires, made according to a new process, the discovery of which was announced several weeks ago from Paris. One of the dealers said that although he had been selling sapphires all his life he cannot see any difference between the synthetic products and the natural stones. He said that he had tried all ordinary tests on the new stones without finding the slightest difference between them and the natural jewels. It was feared that the sapphire trade would be materially interfered with, as it might compel the reduction in price of the natural stones, which are now selling from $100 to $200 a carat. Simultaneously with the appearance of this well-nigh perfect artificial sapphire there was placed on the market a cheaper manufactured sapphire, made of the hardest and most brilliant kind of glass, which is disturbing the jewelers' trade considerably, but which is detected by tests with hydrofluoric acid, which quickly eats into and disfigures it. Precious stones are material expressions of God's absolute beauty, and the successful imitation of these precious jewels by man is the copy of God's beauty and wisdom. The sapphire is used frequently in the Scripture as a symbol of beauty. In the vision which Moses, Aaron and the seventy elders had on the Mount, the Almighty appeared to them to be standing upon a glittering sapphire stone:

And they saw the God of Israel: and there was under his feet as it were a paved work of a sapphire stone, and as it were the body of heaven in his clearness. (Ex. 24: 10.)

Penalty of Fidelity

The collusion between the saloon and politics in New York City has gotten to be so notorious and shameless that in many districts where the policemen undertake to enforce the Sunday closing, or in fact any laws against the saloon, they are immediately transferred to less desirable precincts or suffer some other type of degradation or punishment. The punishment of Keenan and Cunningham and others for their activity in enforcing the law against the saloon was so manifest that specific complaints have been made to Mayor Gaynor, and a general demand is made for an investigation of the whole matter and a reform. Patrolman Cunningham, who was transferred from a Bronx precinct to an unsavory lower East Side post for his activity against the Sunday saloon, instead of hanging his head in cowardice or losing his nerve, went to work in good earnest closing the Sunday saloons in the Eldridge Street district, bringing panic to the liquor dealers and consternation to the politicians who are full partners in the graft and lawlessness of the dramshop. One of the leading dailies, in referring to Cunningham's bravery and activity in the face of such powerful foes, says: "The 'system' will have to keep its eye on Cunningham. The eye of the public is already on him, and it beams with approval." The public press asserts that the Liquor Dealers' Association of New York openly confesses that it has to spend $500,000 in graft each year to secure the protection of the police, especially against violations of the Sunday closing law, and it is said the association has formally asked Mayor Gaynor to stop the graft; but it has not promised to obey the law, but rather demands the right to break the law without the trouble or expense of the bribes. It would be impossible to describe the courage of the splendid policemen who demand that the Sunday law be obeyed and have no itching palm for gold. The words of the Psalmist can be used appropriately with reference to these faithful officers of the law:

Remove from me the way of lying, and grant me thy law graciously. I have chosen the way of truth; thy judgments have I laid before me. I have stuck unto thy testimonies; O Lord, put me not to shame. (Ps. 119: 29-31.)

Remember the Maine

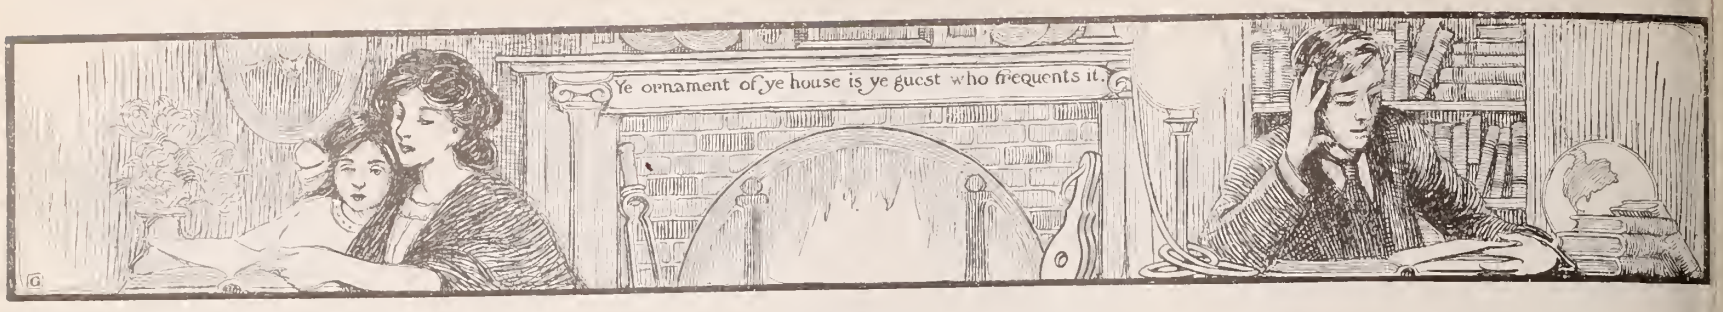
A significant meeting was held in Carnegie Hall, New York, commemorating the destruction of the United States battleship Maine in Havana harbor February 15, 1898. The deep indignation of the meeting that the destroyed ship had not been raised was voiced by Joseph H. Choate, who was president of the meeting, in the following words:

"I visited Havana two years ago, and it made my heart sick to see the wreck of the battleship and to realize that after ten years not a hand has been turned toward raising the shattered hulk or reclaiming the dead still at rest in the harbor basin. I thought to myself at that time that it was no credit to the American people, it was a smirch on American patriotism and an insult to the dead and martyred sailors and officers that their country, for which they were willing to fight and for which they died, has done naught in return." Congressman Sulzer, among other things, said: "The wreck of the Maine must be raised. Gratitude commands it, patriotism demands it, and the honest thinking people of America will never rest content until it is done." By a unanimous vote of the two or three thousand people present there was an imperative demand made upon Congress to raise the Maine and rescue the sixty-three bodies of the martyrs imprisoned in the hulk, and bury them with their fellows, who sleep in Arlington Cemetery. Admiral Sigsbee, who was in command of the Maine when it was destroyed, is president of the Maine Monument Association, and a national subscription fund is being raised for the erection of a suitable monument in memory of the martyrs of the Maine, in the city of Washington. Men and women in New York, Washington, Boston, Philadelphia, and many other cities and smaller places in the country, are becoming deeply interested in the work of securing this monument and will push it to a successful termination. The building of this monument to commemorate the heroism of the two hundred and fifty men who laid down their lives for their country is in harmony with the custom of the ages of erecting stone memorials to the dead and of the affection of the living for them. The Scriptures make mention of the monument which Jacob erected in honor of Rachel, his wife:

And Jacob set a pillar upon her grave; that is the pillar of Rachel's grave unto this day. (Gen. 35: 20.)

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH



Some Open Secrets

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

HERE is a letter addressed to young women. Older women may read it if they choose. Not vanity but common sense has induced some anxious girls to ask me how they may secure a good complexion. No young woman can be blamed for desiring to have a good complexion. A muddy, sallow complexion, a face disfigured by blotches and pimples or a tendency to blackheads and moth patches, is a real trial and one that should not be accepted with patience. When you are young, you should be well and strong. Being in good health every part of the body should be in perfection and there should be no blemish visible on your face and hands. The skin, as you know, is like the most delicate lace, one layer of the cuticle above another. If you look at it through a magnifying glass you will see how the pores are open, and you will understand how it is that the flesh is covered so perfectly that it can resist wind and weather, while still it answers to every call of the nerves and shows to any observer what sort of blood is behind it. Pure blood means a healthful skin. Thin, anæmic blood reveals itself in an unsightly skin. By most of you who read this a good complexion is to be had if you are willing to take a little trouble. Drugs will not give it to you, and you will be far better without them. Nothing that you put on your face out of a bottle or jar will do you any lasting good. In order to have a beautiful and clear complexion it is necessary to avoid two or three foolish things.

Suppose we first enumerate what you would better avoid. You may not find it easy to do without the cup of strong coffee or tea that you fancy braces you up, and that gives you a fictitious strength. Nevertheless, tea and coffee are stimulating drinks in the nature of luxuries, and they would better be left out of the daily diet of any one who wants to be beautiful.

Avoid next rich pastry and hot biscuits. Bread at least a day old is much safer as an article of diet for the girl who wants a good complexion than bread piping hot from the oven. As for tarts, pies and cake, they must be eaten in moderation, if at all, and a surfeit of such food is almost certain to produce pimples, fever sores and other disagreeable excrescences that mar the countenance.

Another thing to avoid is the nibbling habit. The habit of eating peanuts at random through the day, of nibbling caramels and consuming chocolate creams, is perilous. The girl's habit of nibbling sweets, in other words, is almost as much a menace to her health as the boy's habit of indulging in cigarettes is undermining to his. Limit the eating of candy to dessert. Pure sugar eaten after a meal or any form of good candy taken at that time will do you no harm. It is the habit of nibbling between meals that I condemn and which the skin rebels against and suffers from the most.

Now for the rules that must be followed by the girl who cares enough about personal beauty to observe them. A daily bath from head to foot is an absolute necessity. A sponge bath in the morning or at night is sufficient, but it must never be omitted. The pores of the skin must be thoroughly cleansed once a day, and the bath should be followed by vigorous rubbing with a coarse towel. You need not fear to wash your face with soap, if you choose soap of good quality and rinse it thoroughly off the skin, first with tepid and then with cold water. The best time to do this is at night before going to bed. Eat fruit freely every day, making it part of your breakfast. If possible, exercise in the open air, taking a long walk twice a day. Go to bed two hours before midnight, and sleep in a room with windows open top and bottom. This simple way of living will presently reward you by returns of beauty. A cool head, a clear skin, bright eyes, a brain quick to do its work, and a body of which the functions are regular, are the results for girls and for everybody else, of wholesome, plain, practical living. You will not be nervous, cross nor irritable, and whether or not you know it, your prevailing mental condition will have a great deal to do with the matter of your being good to look at. No fretful girl is ever beautiful. A happy disposition and an exquisite texture of skin are not always in combination, but on the other hand they often are. The mind has much to do with ruling the body.

Rescuing a Family During the Paris Flood

THIS illustration shows an incident which has been repeated thousands of times during the great inundation in Paris. If the flood had not begun to subside towards the close of last week, the beautiful French capital would have been the scene of an overwhelming catastrophe. As it is, great damage has been done and many thousands of the poorer classes have been rendered homeless. The French government has made a loan of $20,000,000 for the aid of the poor who have suffered loss by the flood.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—MOTHER. You say that your child of three appears to be near-sighted. The child is not too young to have special treatment. Very small children wear glasses in these days.

—EMMA DAY. Theodora and Dorothy, or Dorothea, mean the gift of God. Any of them will be a good choice for a little girl's name.

Concerning Eye-Strain

DR. GEORGE GOULD, widely known as an oculist and as a voluminous writer on his peculiar specialty, has put forth a strong opinion on the subject of eye-strain. Dr. Gould claims that a majority of the maladies from which men, women and children suffer are traceable in their origin to some visual defect. Few of us will be ready to accept his statements without demur; yet it is undoubtedly true that many instances of headache, of nervous dyspepsia and of unaccountable irritability are caused by astigmatism, or by some disease of the eyes.

Think of it calmly for a moment. Our eyes are the windows of the brain. A delicate network of nerves from the brain reaches to the farthest outpost of the body, and an injury anywhere is instantly telegraphed by them to the central station whence they start. If in our houses we try to peep through opaque glass, if the windows are blurred or broken, we cannot see distinctly, and at once we set about remedying the situation. The eyes are our windows, complicated in their machinery, yet extremely simple, and abused by most of us from first to last, so that it is remarkable that they serve us so long and so well. Middle age comes early to the eyes.

A young woman not long ago went to a specialist for treatment. She was under thirty, but after examination the doctor told her that she had the eyes of a woman of eighty. Whether Dr. Gould be right or wrong, it is certainly the part of wisdom, as one pair of eyes must last us for a lifetime, and as eyes cannot be patched up and repaired as teeth, to take better care of them than we do. We should guard our children carefully in this defect. Many times mischief is done to an almost irreparable extent during the first seven years of a child's life. The use of the right glasses at the right time may save both children and adults an infinite amount of pain and inconvenience.

Nothing is, on the whole, a greater risk than to select lenses for the eyes in a haphazard fashion over the counter. In a matter of so much importance it is well to have the best procurable advice and act upon it without delay. The claim has been made that car-sickness and sea-sickness are due to the constant changing of focus when people are traveling, but we are not quite prepared to admit this is true. At all events, it is still open to discussion.

The Little Girl and Her Dutch Collar

Fifty years ago our little girls were dressed in a fashion that was quaint but which has never regained its vogue. Little maidens under ten wore pantalettes. These were usually finished with ruffles, tucks and embroidery, and came to the ankles. Careful mothers were fastidious about these garments. Of course, they were stiffly starched, and the child who was rather a tomboy was in disgrace if she caught hers on a fence or stained them by heedless tumbles in the dirt. With the pantalettes went aprons that appertained to the dress of every well regulated child. In this period of ours little girls do not wear aprons, but there is a revival of a pretty fashion, very popular in the early fifties. Everywhere there is an efflorescence of wide collars, braided or embroidered, appliquéd or trimmed with lace. If you wish to make a small girl, or a larger one, very happy, just make her a present of one or two or three Dutch collars.

The Other Side of High Prices

A FARMER AND SHIPPER'S VIEW OF THE RISE IN PRICES, AND ITS REMEDY

AT the present time the meat boycott and its effects are occupying the inds of many people. The first re-lt of the boycott was disastrous to l interested except the boycotter. rices declined in the live stock mar-ts from $1 to $2 per hundredweight, id farmers and shippers lost thou-nds of dollars. The following week, ceipts declined over half. Since then nditions have become normal.

All of these animals are sold rough commission men at the dif-rent markets, in quantities from half dozen head to half a dozen cars, cording to the requirements of the rchaser. The farmer and shipper he latter is one who secures car-loads purchasing from farmers) expect eir commission men to advise them omptly as to receipts, prices and arket conditions at the time they ex-ct to ship. If advices are bad, ship-ents are withheld. The farmer can-t and will not, for a long time to me, ship liberally to a market like at following the boycott.

Statistics of the Department of Ag-culture show a decrease of 6,335,000 gs and 2,100,000 head of cattle, her than milch cows, in the United tates between 1908 and 1909. On ebruary 15 the Department of Com-erce and Labor gave out the state-ent that live stock receipts for 1909, seven leading interior markets of e United States, were the lowest nce 1904. For example: Chicago, 9,401 cattle, 1,512,447 hogs, and 11,-57 calves less than 1908, and 89,535 ore sheep, leaving a net loss of 543,270 head. This, considered with gard to the vast increase in popula-on, makes a serious item. Farmers ave received the highest prices paid years, and in some instances the ighest ever paid in the open market r fat animals.

The breaking up of our Western nges, and their occupation by the omesteader, has been the means of priving us of a source of cheap meat. he Eastern feeder went to the large ve stock markets to purchase animals r fattening, range conditions not be-g suitable for fattening. The East-rn States do not take their place.

Cost of feed has increased 40 and 50 er cent. For example: corn, from 5 to 75 cents per bushel; oats, 25 to 0 cents; bran, $1 to $1.50 per hun-redweight, and other feeds in propor-ion. Our home millers are paying he farmer higher prices for wheat han I have known to be paid in the wenty years I have been farming. he Department of Agriculture cred-s the country with very large total ields of grain, and we have millions f people more to feed, besides the loss ncidental to harvesting. Corn, in-ended for shipping from our corn States, is largely picked from the stalk n the fields. Heavy fall rains, fol-owed by heavy snowfalls, have pre-ented the securing of millions of ushels, or unfitted it for shipment. t the opening of the new corn mar-et, No. 2 corn was very scarce, most f it grading No. 4 (damp or heating). With plenty of cattle and hogs, much f this soft corn might be fed on the arms. An Ohio feeder told me he had een offered $10 per hundredweight, live, for his hogs, by a neighbor; but, e said: "I would not sell them at any rice, as I need them to follow my own attle." Feeding in the corn States is sually without husking, hogs follow-ng and picking up the soiled and scat-ered corn, which without them is vasted.

During the era of low prices and the beginning of the scarcity and high price of farm laborers, there was a widespread movement among farmers to dispense with help and do what could be done by themselves. Many animals were marketed that should have been kept on the farm. Farmers are now realizing this. Last fall, in sections where feed was sufficient, higher prices were paid at the farm for good breeding animals of suitable age than they were worth in the open market. We have had two very late springs, followed by severe drought in the Eastern and Middle States. Many cattlemen have had to draw water in tanks long distances for stock. Hay and all coarse feeds are very scarce. Some fields of hay were hardly worth harvesting, and it is now selling quickly to $12 to $18 per ton.

Of thirteen farms, averaging about eighty acres, adjoining one another on two miles of road in my own neighborhood (which ten years ago were productive and occupied by farmers), three are with occupants, and only are farmed in a small way; three not paying expenses; five are producing below normal, and two are producing a trifle above normal, compared with that time. On the same farms there are about 20 head of cattle and 200 sheep, compared with about 40 cattle and 450 sheep ten years ago. This is not an extreme, but fair, example of conditions in the East, outside of the best farm lands, located near large towns or cities.

We are facing a crisis. That this is being recognized by the thinking men of our country is proved by the appointment, by the President, of the Farm Life Commission; and the purchase by some railroad companies of abandoned or run-down farms, for the purpose of demonstrating that they may be made profitably productive.

The New York Central has one in Genesee County and two in the eastern part of New York State. The Buffalo, Rochester and Pittsburg has one, and is contemplating more.

I am an optimist, and I hold that the coming back to the farm will see the lowering of prices. C. S. BROWN.

Pleased with the Change

Dear Editor: I believe you are under the impression that I am a subscriber to the Home Herald. I am not. I paid up my subscription in December, 1909, and have a receipt for same. I also ordered the paper stopped, as I did not care to take it any longer. But since receiving some three or four copies of your paper, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I send you $1.50 subscription for one year, beginning with January, 1910. I like the paper very much. Hoping this will be satisfactory,

A Wireless Message of Spring

A WARBLE faint! A bird in blue
Flits past the snowy hill;
Sap rushes maple branches through;
And sings each icy rill.

Arbutus peeps through sodden leaves;
The pussy-willows bloom;
The daffodils, in golden sheaves,
Light up the twilight's gloom.

Already bees in meadows hum,
And early morning lays
From thrush and wren and robin come,
In hallelujah praise.

The Strawberry Handkerchief

A Tale of Colonial Days in Old New York

By AMELIA E. BARR

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

FOR the benefit of our new subscribers we give a brief synopsis of the preceding chapters of Mrs. Amelia E. Barr's most interesting story: The scene is laid in New York, at the time of the Stamp Act, in 1765. Captain Jansen Van Vroom was a rich, retired sea captain, and lives with his wife Katrina in a fine Dutch house, by the North River. They have a daughter, Virginia, whom they wish to marry to a young sea captain, Batavius De Vries, for whom she has little liking. She is really in love with Joris Artaveldt, a dashing young officer. Virginia's dearest friend is Lady Rose Harley. Captain Van Vroom is bitter against the enforcement of the Stamp Act. Joris and the two girls dine at the captain's house, after which the two men leave. Arent Van Vroom, the son of the house, appears and is introduced to Lady Rose. The next morning Van Vroom describes the condition of New York to his son, and the things which were leading to the breaking point. The Lady Rose becomes interested in Arent when he describes his voyages. Joris declares his love for Virginia, and she returns his affection. Arent, her brother, falls in love with Lady Rose, who gives Virginia a handkerchief embroidered with strawberries. She herself has one like it. Virginia gives Joris the handkerchief. Politically, things grow worse. The people determine to resist the oppression of the British government, and wear only home-made things. Batavius De Vries suddenly returns, expecting to marry Virginia. He is a coarse, bombastic person, and Lady Rose is disgusted with the idea of Virginia marrying him. Joris tells his father of his love for Virginia and he offers no objection. Lady Rose plans to get Batavius drafted into the naval service. Virginia protests to her father against marrying Batavius. He angrily insists. He says the banns must be published within the month, and threatens her. The mother also takes the father's part. Joris tells Van Vroom he loves his daughter and is ordered away. Katherine Van Heemskerk offers to carry Joris' letter to Virginia. Batavius, walking back with Katherine, insults Joris, who lays his hand on his sword, but refrains from action for the lady's sake. She goes to Joris' side. Batavius, at Van Vroom's, jeers at the idea of Joris' gallantry. Virginia thrills with pride and praises Katherine. Arent Van Vroom returns bringing sixteen Southern patriots, including Aiken of South Carolina and Worth of Maryland. Batavius joined in with the rest and then said "Humbug," when out of hearing. The first Colonial Congress opens in New York. Batavius becomes anxious to have Virginia admire him, takes care with his dress and receives Van Vroom's approval. He tells Batavius to tell Virginia she will be betrothed to him on the twenty-eighth of that month. Batavius finds her in her kitchen. He tells her. She says, "Never!" He threatens and raises his arm as if to strike. He breaks a ring in which he had superstitious confidence. He goes for Van Vroom who is more interested in the opening of Congress. Virginia receives a letter from Lady Rose telling her all had been arranged according to her plan, but the words so veiled that others would not understand. Virginia becomes happy at once and Batavius suspects she has a letter from Joris. Madame Van Vroom is alarmed by Virginia's moody changes.

SO the unhappy weeks went away. Two more letters from Rose—both promising the certain success of their plan regarding Batavius—came to Virginia, through Harry Rutgers, and Madame began to suspect Harry of being a messenger from Joris Artaveldt.

"Thou must have noticed, Jan," she said to her husband, "that to-day Virginia spoke to no one unless compelled. Thou thyself asked her a question twice before she answered it; but after Harry had been she was cheerful, and asked thee many questions."

"That is the truth. I had not thought of it before. Very clever art thou, Katrina."

"One thing I know—the sooner she is married, the better it will be."

"I think with thee, and when the Congress have finished their business I will make sure my purpose, without any delay."

"A long time they have been already, and very busy about little work."

"Not so. A great deal they have done—for all generations."

"Men should work for their own generation."

"Not so our members have done their work. It will fit our people—it will fit any people—so long as men know what freedom means."

"All this is well enough, Jan, and I hope it ends well. But now it is not the country; it is our dear daughter. She is to be looked after."

"I will look after Virginia.'

"Suppose, then, she ran away from us?"

"Who with? And where to?"

"There is Joris Artaveldt——"

"That fear is great nonsense. No money has Joris, not one pound except what his extravagant father gives him."

"Well, I know not, only my heart is always on a tremble; more it knows than I know. If she were a ship, and there were rocks ahead, what would thou do?"

"I would take the rudder in my own hands, and she would have to answer it."

"Say once, that she would not answer it; what then?"

A dark, sad look spread over the Captain's face, and he said slowly, and almost in a whisper, "If she would not answer to the rudder—she would then answer—to the rocks!"

With these words he turned away, and Madame did not detain him.

She had indeed hoped that Virginia's father would share her anxiety, and concern himself a little with the temper and condition of his unhappy child; but it was evident he did not understand her need of sympathy. And just at that hour New York was in a mood both dangerous and critical.

The Colonial Congress had been sitting two weeks, and there was a sense of some approaching crisis. Captain Jansen felt it in his heart, but Katrina's complaints about Virginia fretted him like a spur, and very early in the afternoon he returned home determined to have some decided conversation with his daughter. He found her writing in the living-room, and he saw her face for a moment before she noticed his approach. It was full of satisfaction. A soft light fell from her eyes upon her cheeks, and a tender smile made her mouth lovely. She had an air of perfect serenity and even happiness. The moment, however, that she became aware of her father's presence her expression changed to one of anxiety, even alarm, and she instinctively laid her hands over the paper on which she was writing.

"Thou, father?" she asked with an attempt at pleasurable surprise. "Thou! Mother said it would be five o'clock ere thou came home."

"Where is thy mother?"

"She went to sit a few hours with Celia Moran, who is very sick"—and with these words she rose, and began to collect her papers.

"Art thou writing thy French exercises?"

"The French is very difficult, fader. I have the Dutch, and the English, why then trouble myself with the French?"

"Leave thy papers alone—what art thou writing?"

"A girl has many little things to write down, fader."

"What art thou writing?"

"Something — nothing — nothing at all."

"What art thou writing? The truth I want."

"Well, then, a letter to a friend."

"So! What is thy friend's name?"

Virginia remained silent.

"What is her name—wilt thou not tell me? I see. I have made a mistake—what is his name?"

"I will not tell—it is my letter—and my friend. I will not tell thee."

"Then I will tell thee. A love letter to Joris Artaveldt thou art writing, and the letter thou slipped under thy portfolio was a love letter from Joris Artaveldt. Am I not right?"

Virginia set her face stubbornly and made no answer—and her father added: "Leave thy papers alone. Touch not one of them. I will not suffer it."

"They are my papers, father, not thine."

"Now, listen, Virginia, I am going to read both the letter of Joris Artaveldt to thee, and thy answer to it. Where we stand, we shall then clearly know, and remember, Virginia Van Vroom and Joris Artaveldt are alone to blame if these letters tell anything a good girl and a good man would be ashamed to have told."

"Father, let me go away. I beg thee let me go to my room. Father, do not hurt me so much. I cannot bear it."

"The words thou hast written, thou can hear read. That is reasonable."

"It is wicked. It is cruel. I will not stay with thee—let me go away—let me go. I will not stay. Oh, moeder! moeder! Come to me! Come to me!"

"Glad am I, that thy mother is not in the house. Now listen. I told Joris Artaveldt not to speak to thee, and not to write to thee. I told thee not to speak to Joris Artaveldt, and not to write to him. Now we will see what kind of letters wilful disobedience to thy father taught thee to write."

With a cry of despair Virginia rested her arms on the table, and buried her face in her hands. She knew further pleading was useless; there was nothing now to be done but bear the shame and distress she had called into herself—called, too, by such trivial wrongs as a "yes," or a "no," a moment of indecision, a glance of affection, or a neutral attitude of mind, instead of a positive one. Yet she would be judged by the cumulative effects of these small isolated words and acts of unkindness. How was she to bear it?

Slowly, as was his way, but in a clear, low voice, the unhappy father began reading the letter he had recognized as in the handwriting of Joris. He paused at the first sentence, and as he went on the pauses grew longer, and his voice increased in power, until at the close the words sounded as if they were read in a storm:

"VIRGINIA, DEAREST VIRGINIA: At last we may be happy. My father has found a clergyman who will marry us. My father will go with us, and Mrs. Eastman and her sister will be witnesses—and my dear father will welcome you to his home—as his own daughter. The future we will plan here. Oh, beloved, come to me as soon as I return from Jersey, which will be in three days. I am all hope and impatience. Come; come, dear one! Come at once—before made to suffer any more. JORIS."

He stood at the back of Virginia's chair while blundering through this letter; when it was finished, he sat down at her side. "Virginia," he said, "the wickedness of these words takes the light out of my eyes. Justice Artaveldt hates me; thou and all my household know that. Many wrongs he has done me—it was his joy to make my hopes and plans come to nothing. Fifteen years ago I should have sat among His Majesty's Counsillors, but for Justice Artaveldt. The water front next my slip he bought secretly because he knew it was of great value to me. He has done a thousand ill-natured things to me. At my name he drops ever covert slights and mocking words, which he calls 'making a little fun.' He hates without a cause, so then all my forbearance touches him not. Very angry was he when I forbid Joris to see thee. Straight to his father the lad went with his injured pride, and the old man railed at my impertinence—to every one he met; 'a great thing it was for Van Vroom's girl, but the vulgar old sea dog could not see it; and had the impudence, yes, I repeat, the impudence, to order Lieutenant Joris Artaveldt from his house'—and so on. I did not tell thee of his words. I thought it would pain thee. So careful I need not have been. For thy father, nothing thou cares."

"Oh, Fader! Fader! I do care! I do love thee!"

"No. No. That is past. Think one moment on the perfect revenge thou would give to this man. First, he takes on himself to arrange my daughter's marriage. I, and thy mother, whose business this matter is, have no part, no knowledge concerning it. Second, he chooses the witnesses. Thy father and mother do not even know the people chosen. Third, thou art a christened Calvinist; he dares to propose marrying thee by some other form—perhaps, indeed, by a sham minister—this last I believe. Fourth, in this shabby, secret way he will marry thee to his son, and then take thee to his house as his daughter. His daughter! I am no longer thy father!—thy mother is left out of thought or mention. Thou hast been nursed in our hearts, and carried in our arms; nothing of all that money could buy has been withheld from thee. We have put our hearts under thy feet, and have lived to feel thy feet spurn and trample on them. Virginia, thy mother and I have lived one day too long. I wish that we had died yesterday—before thy falsehood and treachery was found out."

"Fader, forgive me! I never thought——"

"Here is thy letter. I cannot read it. All that I can bear I have read."

"But yes, thou must read my letter also. In it thou wilt see I have said, I would not leave my mother, and my father, and my home, unless the very last moment came, and there was no hope. Then," and at the word a great passion took possession of her, she looked with flashing eyes into her father's face, and said vehemently—"then I would fly to poverty, shame, disgrace, slavery, even death, before I would marry Batavius De Vries. Bear his name! Be his wife! No!"

"Go to thy room, and stay there."

"Let me make ready for tea."

"Dost thou think I will eat with thee? No! No!"

She went wearily away, too heavy with a conjunction of sorrows to weep. Her father's anger was almost more than she could bear. In a little while she was able to tell herself that, whatever destiny was before her, she had undoubtedly hurried it forward by her impatience and disobedience.

"My father told me neither to see, nor to speak, nor to write to Joris; and Rose begged me not to complicate events by bringing Joris in any way into them. O wee! O wee! I am to blame. I only am to blame." And surely she spoke the truth, for we always fail on the side we ourselves have weakened.

"Father may now make me marry at once," she reflected, "and I cannot, I dare not oppose him."

Our Lookout Round the World

WE are just beginning to learn something about the real riches we have in Alaska. Mr. Steven Birch, a witness before the Senate Committee on Territories, has testified that the value of the coal deposits controlled by a single syndicate is $25,000,000; yet this syndicate paid only one hundredth of that amount for the property—a striking instance of the way in which we ignorantly squander our finest possessions. The same witness estimated the value of the workable coal deposits in Alaska at $900,000,000, and United States Senator Beveridge estimates their worth at $15,000,000,000.

—THERE is a great outcry, and not a wholly reasonable one, against cold storage, which is one of the results of the present agitation about the high cost of living. An official of one of the largest refrigerator concerns in the East shows the unreasonableness of the public attitude on the storage question. He points out that practically all food products, at certain seasons of the year, are supplied in greater quantities than the public needs for current consumption, and this surplus would eventually go to waste were it not put in cold storage. The absence of refrigerating facilities would thus be a serious loss to farmer, cattleman and fisherman, and would involve a scarcity during the unproductive periods that would force up prices generally. This applies not only to meat, fish and fowl, but to foods of all kinds, and to many other articles that are now preserved in storage. Hence, like everything else, it is not the legitimate use, but the abuse, of cold storage that constitutes an evil. We had an illustration of this lately, when practically the entire egg product was cornered in a time of abundant production and put in cold storage, leaving the market almost bare.

—THE public sense of political decency has been greatly shocked by the recent exposures in the Albany bribery trial. It has been shown that bribes were taken by members of both political parties impartially, and that during the years from 1902 to 1905, if not later, corruption funds were doing their evil work in the New York State Legislature unhindered. Reputations of the dead and the living have been smirched by these disclosures, which emphasize the necessity of greater care in the selection of good men as the people's representatives. There should also be some available method of promptly expelling a corrupt legislator and filling his place by special election.

—OUR suggestion last week that a practical form of recognition of Peary's Arctic work would be a medal and an appropriation has been promptly adopted by Congressman Loud of Michigan, who has introduced a bill to give the explorer a vote of thanks, a medal and an annuity of $5,000 per annum.

—STEP by step the old East is coming into Western ways. China already has railroads and telegraphs, and now she is about to introduce streetcars in her principal cities. The Philippines, too, are to have a trolley system in the near future.

—ITALY is contemplating a wonderful thing for woman, which will place that country well in the front of liberal European governments. Deputy Gallini has laid before Parliament a measure sanctioning female suffrage in provincial and municipal elections, permitting women to practise in the professions and to enter the public service, and abolishing the "husband's consent," heretofore held to be essential to the legality of any act by a woman. Premier Sonnino has expressed himself favorably to this measure, which he considers justified by "the recent intellectual, economic and social improvement in the condition of woman." Of course, the plan may be subjected to modification in the Chamber, but it has a fair likelihood of passage.

—TIBET, whose capital, Lhasa, has just been occupied by a force of Chinese troops, has a very old civilization, which is now decadent. A writer tells of a Tibetan handbook on medicine, 1,200 years old, which prescribes drugs and methods of treatment which have been known to European physicians only a few centuries. Those doctors of ancient Tibet were thorough anatomists, and knew all that science could teach them about the skin, and the functions of the heart, stomach and liver; they also knew the value of vegetarian diet, baths, compress and massage. They were apparently far in advance of the medical men of any other Eastern country.

—ABDUL HAMID, the deposed Sultan of Turkey, is now said to be mentally deranged. When we remember his slaughter of men and his record of intrigue, assassination, massacre and other hideous crimes, it is not surprising that he should find the burden of his sins so oppressive that his reason would give way. He is represented as a poor, solitary, hopeless imbecile, bereft of the last vestige of power, and deserted even by his own children.

—WITH the approach of spring rumors of a coming war in the Balkans are revived. Bulgaria is an armed camp. Forty thousand of Ferdinand's troops are in readiness at Kostendil, three hours' march from the Turkish frontier. The conflict between Turkey and Bulgaria has long been brewing and cannot much longer be delayed.

—CHICAGO seems likely to have the distinction, in the near future, of being the best and most economically lighted city in the world. It is planned to light the city with 22,200 electrical lamps, the electricity being generated by the Sanitary District Canal at Lockport. The cost will be $15 per lamp per annum, a saving of $300,000 on present figures.

—THE Masonic fraternity has formed a National Memorial Association for the purpose of erecting a $1,000,000 temple in honor of Washington upon a street in Alexandria, Va., laid out by the "father of his country" when he was a young surveyor. It is near the spot where, in 1754, while he was a colonel, he quartered his troops before the memorable march to the Ohio River.

—THE tragic end of Empress Elizaba of Austria, twelve years ago, was stlingly recalled by the surrender to tl Cincinnati police of a man named Cristian Keppler, a few days ago. Kpler, who is forty-nine years old, cfesses that he took part in the assination of the Empress in Geneva. Aording to his own story, he has cmitted many crimes since, some of tln in this country.

—ALTHOUGH President Taft, in his msage at the opening of Congress, ued economy in all the departments a a general revision of appropriatis, Congress apparently did not take th same view of matters, for the redtions which have been made thus fa do not represent a saving of more th three million dollars. This is not a all in accord with the President's whes nor with the policy he has outlid. In an address at a banquet in Nvark, N. J., recently, Mr. Taft expssed the hope that the commission ajointed to revise government methoo would save at least one hundred mions. This, he believed, could be aomplished without interfering with th programme for the enlargement of th Navy.

—NOTWITHSTANDING the recent indiments for conspiracy found against seral big meat packing concerns, in cnection with the investigation of th rise in prices, the packers have a in advanced the prices of meats gerally. Without giving any exphation, they have put up beef by thcarcass, and hams, bacon, mutton, cles and lamb in proportion. The rilers have protested against the pes, but without result, and they a now loudly declaring that "the tst is getting all the money." One hdred and fifty butcher shops in Ny York City have already closed, a it is expected that five hundred me will be forced out of business by th high prices and the drop in trade. It is evident that the meat investigation has given the meat barons no uneasiness.

ITEMS IN BRIEF

—THE National City Bank of Cambridge, Mass., is closed on account of a shortage of $140,000. G. W. Coleman, the bookkeeper, is missing.

—BONTROS PACHA GHALI, the Egyptian Premier and Foreign Minister, was shot dead by a student in Cairo. The assassin, a nationalist, was arrested.

—DR. CHARCOT, the French Antarctic explorer, reports important discoveries in the south polar region. He believes the new land to be a portion of an unknown continent.

—OUR first egg-laying contest will be held at the national experiment station in Mexico, Mo., at which 10,000 hens from this country and Europe will be in competition.

—DR. BOTKIN, physician to the Czarina of Russia, having been accused by the Czar of a mistake in diagnosing the Empress' malady, committed suicide by taking poison.

—IT IS proposed to provide, at the nation's expense, a mansion for the Vice-President in Washington. The provision to that effect may be inserted in the next appropriation bill.

Kind Words From the Bench

Dear Dr. Klopsciev..—I was pleased to receive premiums on renewal for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The "Dreamland" calendar certainly appeals to all that is noblest, best and purest in any one who looks at it. The artist has surely caught the true spirit of babyhood. The "Daughters of Dorcas" is instructive, as both useful and entertaining. I have been fascinated with Heroes of American Life, and have taken much pleasure in reading it aloud to my family whenever I am permitted to be at home. The only trouble is to sometimes keep the lump out of my throat so as to continue reading. With kindest regards and best wishes, I am,

HOWARD WATCH ANNOUNCEMENT

YOU will never again be able to buy a Howard Watch for as little as $35, unless it is one your dealer happens to have in stock at this writing.

On February 1st, the E. Howard Watch Works discontinued the making of the $35 grade of Howard Watch.

We have here a compact organization of highly skilled watch-men. It takes a long time to perfect a Howard Watch—cased, timed, permanently adjusted—"seasoned" for a lifetime of service.

In its sixty-five years of History the making of a Howard Watch has never been slighted or hurried.

There are never quite enough Howards to go round. Of late the demand is such that we are compelled to concentrate on the finer movements.

As necessity demands we will gradually discontinue the less expensive grades—thereby raising the average quality-standard of the Howards in use and incidentally increasing the value of his investment to every Howard owner wherever he may be.

A Howard Watch is always worth what you pay for it.

The price of each Howard is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached—from the 17-jewel (double roller escapement) in a "Jas. Boss" or "Crescent" gold-filled case at $40.00 to the 23-jewel in a 14-k solid gold case at $150.

Victor

The patented Victor goose-neck tone-arm in playing position.

The patented Victor goose-neck tone-arm when not in use.

The sweetest, clearest tone ever heard in any musical instrument.

"What makes the Victor tone so sweet, clear and natural, and of such splendid volume?" people ask as they become captivated by the unequaled Victor tone-quality.

The goose-neck construction of the tone-arm is largely responsible. A little thing in itself, but a great big thing in what it accomplishes.

It puts the weight of the sound-box in the proper place and at the proper angle to get the best results from every record.

Its flexibility enables the reproducing point to follow the lines of the sound-waves so closely that every detail is reproduced with absolute fidelity.

And besides improving the tone, the goose-neck adds to the convenience of using the Victor.

This exclusive patented goose-neck is only one of the many valuable features that help to make the Victor the world's greatest musical instrument.

If you have never heard a Victor of the present time, go today to the nearest dealer's and hear it.

He will gladly play some of the new Victor Records that mark the greatest advance ever made in the art of recording. Ask particularly to hear the new Gadski-Caruso duets from "Aida" (89028 and 89029).

And be sure to hear the Victrola.

The Victor catalogue is replete with both single- and double-faced records. No difference in quality—only in price. Buy double-faced if the combination suits you.

BUILT A MONUMENT

The Best Sort in the World.

"A monument built by and from Postum," is the way an Ill. man describes himself. He says:

"For years I was a coffee drinker until at last I became a terrible sufferer from dyspepsia, constipation, headaches and indigestion, and was a physical wreck.

"The different kinds of medicines I tried did not cure me, but finally some one told me to leave off coffee and take up Postum. I was fortunate in having the Postum made strictly according to directions on the pkg., so that from the start I liked it. It has a rich flavour and I made the change from coffee to Postum without any trouble.

"Gradually my condition changed. The old troubles disappeared and I began to get well again. My appetite became good and I could digest food. Now I have been restored to strength and health. Can sleep sound all night and awake with a fresh and rested body. Everyone who meets me comments on my getting so plump and rosy.

"I am really a monument built by Postum, for I was a physical wreck, distressed in body and mind, and am now a strong, healthy man. I know exactly what made the change, it was leaving off coffee and using Postum."

Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

What It Means to Follow Jesus*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

A FEW brief explanations, as we enter on the study of the lesson, will help the reader to a better understanding of its message.

"Came unto his own city," after his rejection at Gadara. Jesus crossed the Sea of Galilee, and came to Capernaum. Having "not where to lay his head," he probably entered into the house of Peter. To hear him teach crowds gathered, and filled the house.

"They brought to him a man sick of the palsy," remembering that only a short time before, in that very house, and in the street adjacent, he had healed all who were brought to him. The palsied man was entirely helpless, and so was brought on a rug, or thin mattress, carried by four persons. In Mark, chapter 2, we read that the house was so filled with people listening to Jesus that the four men could not gain entrance with their burden, so they ascended to the roof by way of the outside stairs. They then made a hole in the roof, just overhead, where Jesus was speaking, through which they let the man down, holding by the four corners of the rug and lowering the man until he lay at the feet of Jesus. Then the crowd could do nothing else but make room for the sick man. The roof was probably made of tiles, and had therefore been easily broken by the four men.

"Jesus, seeing their faith"—the faith of the bearers, not of the man himself; a great encouragement to work and pray for others.

"Son, thy sins are forgiven"—the words which Jesus spoke to the palsied man. He had been brought for healing, but Jesus saw that he was a sinful man, and could not be cured until his sins were taken away. Just as a splinter must be removed before a wound will heal.

"This man blasphemeth." Words which the Pharisees thought about Jesus when they heard him forgive the sins of the palsied man. And they thought further, "Who can forgive sins but God, and therefore this man makes himself as God."

"Wherefore think ye evil in your hearts?" How startled the Pharisees must have been to have their thoughts read, and read aloud!

"That ye may know that the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sins." And saying this, Jesus showed his power by healing the sick man. At his command, "Arise, and take thy bed, and go unto thy house," the palsied man rose up and went out of the house, carrying his bed with him.

"They were afraid, and glorified God." What they saw impressed them more powerfully than what they had heard.

"Follow me. And he arose." Again the word of Jesus was powerful, that it could cause a man to leave a lucrative business at a moment's notice, and enter upon a service that had no emo' ments. That is what Matthew did when he arose from his place, a collector of customs, and followed Jesus.

"Many publicans and sinners came and sat down with Jesus and his disciples." We are not told in whose house this occurred. Evidently not in P ter's house, for it was on the way to some other place that Jesus had found Matthew. We read in Luke's Gospel, referring to this incident, that it was Levi who was called, and that Levi made a great feast in his own house, at which a great company of publicans and others sat down with Jesus (Luke 5:27-29). Levi is but another name for Matthew.

"They that are whole have no ed of a physician," said Jesus. Su as they thought themselves to be uld have no need of help.

"I desire mercy and not sacri e." Jesus would have the Pharisees ow that he considered loving service ore acceptable to God than the forma ies connected with the temple servic to which they were unduly devoted.

Help for Our Everyday Life

The four Capernaum philanthro sts indicate lines of duty for us in ur actions toward others: (1) he ng others, (2) helping the most hel ss, (3) using wise methods of helpful ss, (4) having faith in Jesus as a he er.

"I should like to be of some u in the world; I should like to do g d," said Emily Reed, suddenly pu ng back her chair from the piano. Her friend, Mrs. J., came to her side nd gently said, "My dear, before w an do good, we must be good."

"I never thought of that before ut, of course, it must be true," re ed Emily. And then she sighed, "O if one only could do good, without ha ng to be good!"

"Get right with God"—that shou be our first aim, and then he will g lly give us of the abundant work h as to be done. The words of Jesus, "The harvest indeed is plenteous, but the laborers are few," are just as tru to-day as when he spoke them. "Get right with God," and then "Get ht with men," by being always a he ful friend. Do not wait for your mi on to find you, but discover what od wants you to do by seeking the ost needy, and sinful, and helpless on in your community, and minister to m.

If there were smiles for sale
At some fair market where
The rich, the poor, the low, the high,
Might hurry with their change to buy,
What crowds would gather there!

Yet there are smiles enough,
And each might have his share
If every man would do or say
One—just one—kind thing every day,
To lift some other's care. S. E. ER.

See how it works in the com on-places of life: A good man n ed William Gray, who lived near a all town in New Hampshire, had a rse that sometimes strayed from the m-mon. A drunken farmer, who dis ed Gray for being a religious man, pu he strayed horse into the pound, an on being remonstrated with, said, "A if I meet him again on the road, I do it again." "Neighbor," said Gray, "not long since I looked from my in-dow and saw some of your catt in my meadow, and I drove them out nd did not leave them out until I hut them safely in your yard; and I find them there again, I'll do it ag !" The man was so struck with this ply that he paid the charge of G y's horse in the pound, and became a et-ter neighbor ever after. This ory teaches us that there is need of g ng moral and mental help, as well as ys-ical help.

If the world seems cold to you,
Kindle fires to warm it!
Let their comfort hide from view
Winters that deform it.
Hearts as frozen as your own
To that radiance gather;
You will soon forget to moan,
"Ah, the cheerless weather!"

If the world's a wilderness,
Go, build houses in it!
Will it help your loneliness
On the winds to din it?
Raise a hut, however slight;
Weeds and brambles smother:
And to roof and meal invite
Some forlorner brother.

If the world's a vale of tears,
Smile till rainbows span it!
Breathe the love that life endears,
Clear from clouds to fan it.
Of your gladness lend a gleam
Unto souls that shiver;
Show them how dark Sorrow's stream
Blends with Hope's bright river.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

The joy of doing good is the largest ward one can have for being helpful t others, and yet it sometimes hap- ns that reward comes in another fm. Mayer Anselm Rothschild was poor Jew, who began his life as a ck in a German banking house, t. left an immense fortune at his th. This was divided among his f sons, the youngest of whom, Jnes, was an intimate friend of the brated Dutch painter, Ary Schef- f. At one time the baron sat as a bgar for the artist, and a gentleman vo entered the studio supposed him t be a veritable beggar, picked up fm the streets. On leaving, he ske kindly to the poor fellow and s ped a louis into his hand. Several yrs after he received a note from Bon Rothschild, then an eminent b ker in Paris, enclosing a check for 1000 francs, saying that it was the a umulated interest on the gold piece gen to the supposed beggar boy.

This, of course, was quite an un- ual circumstance, but it always fol- lcs that interest is laid up in the Bnk of Heaven for every good deed d e, for every kind word spoken to tl needy and helpless.

lelping People to Help Themselves

he Capernaum philanthropists slwed their wisdom in taking their hpless neighbor to Jesus. They did tl very best thing possible. This sgests that there are wise and un- we ways of aiding the helpless. It is rprising often to look over articles ofwearing apparel donated for the po: Dilapidated ostrich feather boas, rged lace petticoats, shabby dress sts, old-fashioned beaver dress hats, et Such things can be of no earthly acount to the poor, nor from the giv- inof them can there accrue anything tohe heavenly account of the donors. Gerally speaking, the best way to gi aid is to help people to help them- sees. Jesus recognized this prin- cie when he made the palsied man al to walk and carry his own bed, rar than to be carried about on th bed by his kind friends. As far asossible, all charitable institutions shld take on the character of giving se help, otherwise those to whom chrity is given are only weakened ar made more helpless. Some years ag this matter was investigated in N York City, in the region of cheap te ment houses. It was observed th in tenements where twelve fami- lie were living, and one or two fa lies getting their living by beg- gi from door to door, it was not my months before nearly all of the fa lies were begging, because they co l get more money, food and clothes by begging than by working. How dirent would have been the result if e begging family had been helped to a working family! This is not do oftentimes, because it is so much ea r to give money and food than to ecure work. And then the do- no often take much comfort in the thght of being generous. Here cos in the benefit of organized chrity: A certain family that was co dered hopeless was removed from "Pverty Gap" and set up, with a mo h's rent paid and seven dollars' wo h of furniture, and work found foall in the family who were old enugh to work. One of the charity vis rs superintended the removal, an the new start in housekeeping. Sh showed the mother and children ho to clean the room, arrange the fu ture and prepare the supper. Sh set the table, and invited them to sit own. The children looked at each oth, and the mother burst into tears; nev since she had been a mother had sh eat at the table with her children to t. That family was won. Since our first outlay we have helped them onl twice, with a dollar on the rent, wh work was slack, and a few times with a pair of shoes. But what ex- penditure of time and thought it has cost us! What expenditure of sym- pathy and cheer! What exertion to find suitable employment, to inspire hope, to train to diligence, to keep up courage! It is solidarity that keeps this family decent and self-supporting, and makes them the hope, not the men- ace, of society; the assured conviction that they and we are one, to meet all the needs that may arise. The cost to us of this whole family's earthly sal- vation is about twenty dollars, plus love and hard work. The saving to the State, first and last, may surely be reckoned by thousands of dollars.—From Records of the Charity Organi- zation Society.

The Story of One Sister

Listen to the story of "Ganger Liz": "Say, mister, do you say that God loves every one of us?" "Yes, sister, he does." "Well, how can God love such a looking thing as me?" And as she spoke the poor, besotted creature looked down at her ragged and dirty garments. "My sister, the sun is ninety-five millions of miles away, and shines in the streets every day; the sun is light, and it can't help shining. God is love, and he can't help loving; and, though we fall ever so low, if we will let him, he will lift us up. He has helped others, he will help you." "But, then, I can't go to him. I'm no good any more, and for me to go to God, it's too hard. I can't do it." "But, my sister, you don't have to climb to get into God's arms; you have only to nestle down into the arms of your heavenly Father, as years ago you nestled down into your mother's arms when you were tired of playing." "Well, if that is so, I will do anything, be anything, for him; and say, if I am good, and if I try to do the right thing, do you think I might see my mother in heaven some day? Oh, my God, how good she was!" And poor "Ganger Liz" bowed her face in her hands and burst into sobs. . . . Do you see that sweet-faced woman, who, as she talks to that flashily-dressed girl, looks as tender and earnest as a guardian angel might look when it sees a soul in danger? Well, that is "Ganger Liz" —Sister Lizzie now, washed in the blood of the Lamb.

And the Capernaum philanthropists teach us to have faith in Jesus. If they had not had faith in Jesus they would not have brought the palsied man to him, they would not have put forth such strenuous effort to place him at the feet of Jesus. We could wish that their names might have been told us, but we know what they were by their fruits—believers in the Lord Jesus Christ, and his faithful follow- ers. If they had not been so, they never would have thought of bringing the man to Jesus.

CHANGE THE VIBRATION

It Makes for Health.

A man tried leaving off meat, potatoes, coffee, etc., and adopted a breakfast of fruit, Grape-Nuts with cream, some crisp toast and a cup of Postum.

His health began to improve at once for the reason that a meat eater will reach a place once in a while where his system seems to become clogged and the machinery doesn't work smoothly.

A change of this kind puts aside food of low nutritive value and takes up food and drink of the highest value, already partly digested and capable of being quickly changed into good, rich blood and strong tissue.

A most valuable feature of Grape-Nuts is the natural phosphate of potash grown in the grains from which it is made. This is the element which transforms albumen in the body into the soft gray substance which fills brain and nerve centres.

A few days' use of Grape-Nuts will give one a degree of nervous strength well worth the trial.

Look in pkgs for the little book, "The Road to Wellville." "There's a Reason."

RESIGNATION

TO lose my will, O Lord, in Thine,
And all my griefs to Thee resign;
To fully trust Thy love divine
To lift the burdens that are mine,
For this I pray.

Amid the darkness and the gloom
That ever circle round the tomb,
May in my heart be ever room
For Faith to save me from the doom
Of black despair.

The darkened glass prevents the sight
From seeing things in their true light.
Oh, may I ever trust Thy might
To bathe in light, life's darkest night,
Some sweet, sweet day.

"Come unto Me, thou weary one."
These words of peace from the dear Son,
My grief torn heart have surely won—
Thou wilt support till I am done
With life's short race.

Unite the Forces of Temperance

By Hon. Henry W. Blair, Ex-United States Senator

THE one great imperative duty of all forces which are against the traffic in alcohol, opium and all poisonous drugs, for other than medicinal and scientific purposes and for use in the arts, is to get together.

I remember the temperance reform, as it has progressed since the year 1843 until the present time, and I do not hesitate to say that in my opinion there has been an amount of mental and moral effort put forth, and of time and money expended, sufficient to have swept the whole foul business out of existence long ago if it had only been properly organized and systematically and judiciously administered.

Dr. D'Aubigne opens his History of the Reformation with a sentence something like this, as I now remember it: "Unity in diversity and diversity in unity is a law of nature, as well as of the church."

It is of no more use to try to reduce the various shades of opinion and forms of organized effort to one straitjacket uniformity in this great temperance crusade than it would be to demand absolute uniformity in physical dimensions of the personnel, and the weapons, organizations, training, discipline and branches of service of a great army before it should be allowed to march forth conquering and to conquer.

Some will look upon the anti-saloon movement as the all-important and efficient method of accomplishing the great result; others will find it in national or in State prohibition of both the manufacture and sale, or in both national and State prohibition; others still will insist upon that form of opposition which comes from the increasing pressure of continually higher and higher license of the crime itself, as the condition of their service, upon the principle that "half a loaf is better than no bread."

Secular and religious organizations have each their separate forms and methods of effort, and all these have a general tendency to one common end—the extinction of the terrible evils which poisonous drugs inflict upon humanity.

It is necessary, if anything is ever to be actually accomplished, that all these various forces get together.

Distinct like the billows, yet one like the sea; diverse in their unity and united in their diversity, let each one in his own way hit the head of the devil wherever he sees it; and, all helpful of each and each helpful of all, let every individual and every organization, in the spirit of conciliation and of combination, go about this business and finish it up. It is not only a State and a national, but it is a world-wide evil. It embodies everything in concrete form that civilization and Christianity must overcome, if they are themselves to exist. The battle is to the death between them, and there can be no great battle successfully fought without a comprehensive and adequate plan. Because humanity is one it is necessary that this organization and effort should be international, as well as national, State and individual, in its organization.

All the signs of the times indicate that the better influences operating in the world are awakening to the necessity of harmonious and combined action. The churches of all denominations have this whole thing in their control. The clergy of the country have always been the supreme uplifting, all-sustaining, human agency in the civilization and Christianization of the world. They can have this thing just as they please, and the responsibility is upon them. Let them advance in their leadership, and the rest of us will follow. It will cost some money, as well as prayers, petitions and zealous talk.

Inscribe on the banner: "Personal Abstinence; and Prohibition, State, national and international, of the manufacture and sale of all poisonous drugs to create and gratify unnatural appetite; also their importation, exportation and transportation, by treaty, and by legislation, State and national, constitutional and statutory."

Temperance Notes

"Catch My Pal"

THE London correspondent of the New York Sun relates the following interesting incident:

One day last July a Presbyterian clergyman in the city of Armagh persuaded twelve hard drinkers to sign the pledge. Before parting with them he said:

"Now, perhaps each of you could bring a pal to my house to-morrow, and induce him to sign."

"I think I can catch my pal," said one of the men, and that was the origin of the "Catch My Pal" movement now sweeping over the north of Ireland.

Scarcely a town or village in Ulster is without an enthusiastic band of members, each of whom wears an enameled brass button bearing the words, "Protestant Catch My Pal Union." The public houses in many of the provincial manufacturing towns have lost fully 50 per cent. of their trade. Of the 3,000 inhabitants of Cookstown, County Tyrone, over 700 men joined the union in November and December, and the percentage is equally great in other towns.

A Liquor Dealer's Income

The average annual income of the American liquor dealer, according to a recent estimate, is over $7,000. These figures are based on an estimate of 50 drinks to a gallon of whisky and 12 glasses of beer to the gallon. Many saloonkeepers, however, by generous adulteration, make a gallon of whisky yield 70 drinks. One village saloonkeeper took in over the bar $24,000 a year, and his only competitor in the village took in $16,000 yearly. These men were getting rich, while the village community was being impoverished. This is the experience of thousands of similar communities all over the country, where the saloon is gradually absorbing the wealth and manhood, and sapping the morals, and ruining homes, and yielding nothing in return.

Deer in Massachusetts

In the northwestern portion of Massachusetts the herds of deer are likely soon to become a genuine plague to the farmers.

There is a Game and Fish League in that State, which has put through many laws for the protection of wild animals. One of these laws is that a man may shoot a deer with a shotgun if he sees it actually destroying his produce. Even if he knows it has been eating his garden vegetables, he must not shoot the deer unless he sees it in the very act of eating them. He must not under any circumstances, shoot it with a rifle.

One farmer in Charlemont, Mass., who stacked his corn in the field, but did not get it into his barn before the snow came, is thereby supplying food for many deer. They burrow into the deep snow until they reach the corn, which is a godsend to them. The field in which it stands looks as though an army with hoofs had invaded it.

When you ride along the country roads you are likely to see groups of the beautiful creatures standing directly in the road, or peering at you through the trees. The other day some boys who were passing through a forest in Heath heard footsteps behind them and discovered that a fine doe, with her little one, was following them. She was not going to hurt them. She was only interested to see what they were about.

The deer are so tame that they will often come up quite close to a man or boy and walk along beside him.

It would seem brutal to kill such gentle and graceful creatures, if it were not that they prey upon the farms and destroy immense amounts of growing fruits and vegetables.

A man in Florida, Mass., killed two deer lately. If the inspectors had found him out, he would have been heavily fined, but his little son did not know this.

He happened to be where a man was skinning up a beef, and remarked, "My father has got two of those hanging up in the barn, all ready to cook; but he got his out in the woods."

The neighbor knew what kind of beefes were meant, and that they were really deer, and he ought to have informed the inspectors, but he did not.

The New York Times says that in New York State, as it is also against the law to kill deer there, the people in a certain mountain town are puzzled to know what to do with a crippled deer which has strayed into their borders. Attempts have been made to set its broken leg, but they have failed. The leg will have to be cut off, and apparently the poor deer will have to be set free to wander over the hills all its life with only three legs.

A Strange Account Book

A FIRE broke out in Farmer Dike's barn one night. As the hired man had been smoking his pipe out there during the evening, it was supposed that he had tossed a burning match into some hay or litter, or had emptied his pipe-ashes into some inflamable stuff. The spark had probably smouldered, and the thin streak of fire had spread, until at last it had burst out into full flame.

Jacob Dike, the eldest son, was the first to discover the conflagration. A smell of smoke and the lurid shadows dancing on the wall had awakened him. With a few wild cries, he roused the rest of the family, and they were all soon rushing in and out of the burning building, attempting to save the animals, the grain and hay, and the tools and machinery.

It was evident that the fire was making such rapid progress that very little could be saved. One of the neighbors, who had hurried half-dressed to the scene, was therefore astounded to see the old farmer himself calmly working away with a screwdriver at the hinges of the barn door.

"Man, you're crazy!" he shouted. "Let that old door burn! There's two calves in there yet, and the corn-sheller, and lots of other things. Come on!"

But Farmer Dike still worked away at the tough old door, while one by one valuable living creatures and expensive tools were left to perish.

Just as the roof dropped in with an awful crash, and a shower of sparks and brands fell all around him, he staggered out into the open, with his big barn door on his back.

"I hope you're satisfied now," sneered the neighbor. "You might have saved a hundred dollars' worth of stuff while you have been unscrewing that big piece of kindling wood."

"I couldn't stop just then to explain," said the old farmer calmly, "but I'll let you know now, that all my accounts for the last seven years are on that barn door. It's worth more to me than the whole barn besides and all that was in it."

It is generally wise to reserve one's opinion until one knows the facts in the case.

Something About a Wedding

PHILIP came into the primary schoolroom one morning, and informed the teacher that the flag was up.

"Is it?" said she, doubtfully.

"It certainly is, and it isn't the Fourth of July, or Washington's Birthday, or Lincoln's, and I couldn't think why the flag should be up. Why is it?"

The teacher thought a minute or more, but could not remember any anniversary worthy of notice by a flag-raising on that especial day.

"I don't know, I am sure," she said at last. "Go and find out, and then come and tell me."

Philip hurried away. In a few minutes he was back, with a bright and satisfied face.

"It's to celebrate somebody's wedding," he reported.

"Wedding?" repeated the mystified teacher. "There isn't any wedding on the whole list of our historical celebrations."

"That's what it says on the card anyhow," insisted Philip. "It's something about a wedding."

The teacher pondered a few moments. Then she decided that she would look for herself. What she saw on the card was as follows:

"This day is the anniversary of the engagement of the Monitor and the Merrimac."

An Astronomer's Appreciation

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I have received the beautiful "Dreamland" calendar that you sent me. I thank you much for it. How beautiful it is! I look at it a hundred times a day, and think, in the language of the poet, it is:

thing of beauty and a joy forever.

Again thanking you for the gift and the kindly feeling which prompted it, and with assurances that the beautiful picture has made my Christmas more delightful, I am sincerely yours,

For Sunday Suppers Hasty Luncheons
Busy-Day Dinners Unexpected Guests

Here is a dish that everyone likes—a food as hearty as meat—a meal that would take you 16 hours to prepare.

A dish that remains fresh and savory. It can be served hot or cold. The best meal of the kind that a chef ever prepared.

And your grocer supplies it—ready to serve in a minute—at about the cost of home-baked beans. Think what it means—in a hundred emergencies—to have a few cans of Van Camp's on the shelf.

And Van Camp's are baked in steam ovens. Not crisped, not broken—always nut-like, mealy and whole.

They don't ferment and form gas, as do home-baked beans, because the fierce heat has made them digestible.

The tomato sauce is baked into the beans, giving a delicious blend.

The result is baked beans at their best—beans made inviting. And as beans are 84 per cent. nutriment—hearty, staple and cheap—they cut down the meat bills, in these days of high prices, when you serve beans that people like.

So Van Camp's are more than convenient.

The National Dish Van Camp's BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE The National Dish

PORK AND BEANS

Van Camp's, as you know, outsell all other brands. And these are the principle reasons:

We use only the choicest Michigan beans—the whitest and plumpest. They cost us four times what some beans would cost.

We use only whole, vine-ripened tomatoes. And our sauce costs five times what common sauce sells for.

This dish is our pride—the final result of 48 years' experience. Just compare Van Camp's with another brand, and see what our methods mean.

Amatite ROOFING

Needs No Painting

MOST ready roofings require special painting and coating, and unless this is done regularly, you are sure to have leaks and trouble right along.

If you use Amatite, nothing of the sort is required. You will have real roof protection without painting of any kind.

Amatite is made to stay waterproof and give protection year after year, without any thought or care on your part.

First---Because it is waterproofed with Coal Tar Pitch.

Second---Because it has a real Mineral Surface.

Amatite, owing to these features, is the most economical roofing made. Its first cost is low, and you are saved all future expense for repairs or paint because it will need neither.

If you haven't seen Amatite, write for a sample to-day. From it you will very quickly understand why it doesn't require painting; why it does not leak; and why it saves you money.

Rewarded Toil

AT early dawn I dreamed this dream:
My spirit struggling through its prison bar,
And passing from its limited confines of clay,
Soared through the open gates of pearl afar,
And entered the great light of Judgment Day.

Upon His throne the mighty Judge of all;
I trembling knelt in sorrow and in shame.
So small the harvest gleaned I had to bring,
No commendation could I hope for, naught but blame,
For one who saw much work to do, yet failed in everything.
I heard the Judge say: "Child, thy talent now restore.
What hast thou done there in the world below?
Hast waged the battle 'gainst the foe both strong and sore?
Didst heed the call 'twas given thee to know?"

I raised my drooping eyes and said:
"Lord, I have longed to do some work for thee.
But, oh! the days were long and full of heavy care,
And hands and brain so weary that I could not see
The mighty deeds, the ripened grains so fair;
I heard the call, but had no time to heed;
I felt the burning flame within my soul;
Conscious that pen of mine would stir the noble deed
And cause Thy name in trumpet tones to roll.
But, Lord, I grieve, I had no time for lofty theme,
For daily, humble duties claimed my care.
The common household ways, so dull they seem.
They claimed my all, no spirit left to dare."

The Great Judge understood;
"That was a talent, child, I gave to thee,
The gift to call, and stir, and thrill the host,
Fame waited at thy door hadst thou but oped to see,
But lowly duty's call thou heeded most.
'Tis great to stir the world with mighty song or deed,
As great the hourly, daily, lowly, toil for me.
No work, though great or small, fails its reward. The seed Grows, strong or weak, so that all men may see.

"And now thy days of unrewarded toil are o'er,
For thee the robe of white, the jeweled crown;
A home eternal on the golden shore,
Where heaven's joys begin, earth's burden all laid down."

—CARABEL G. WARDELL.

The Kentucky Mining Disaster

DR. JAMES T. PIERCE, of Drakesboro, Ky., writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: "The unfortunate explosion did not occur in our mine, but in a neighboring one. The scene of the sad accident was at the little mining camp called Browder, Ky., just one mile south of Drakesboro, which event has cast a sad gloom over the citizens of Drakesboro. We feel it our bounden duty to do all we can to assist in alleviating the suffering and distress among the bereaved families, also the widows and orphans. We hand you herewith the names of those who are among the very needy, and who have none of this world's goods. One woman in particular has no friends who can be of help to her. She has four small children and is in a pitiable condition. We will be pleased to have any assistance for those in dire distress." Mr. Pierce encloses a list of white and colored sufferers, thirty-seven in all, many of whom have left widows and large families of little children, who must now look to charity. Any contributions for their aid sent to this journal will be forwarded to Mr. Pierce.

A Blessing to Every Home

Dear Dr. Klopsch: We are delighted with the calendar and pictures, and return many thanks for them. They are lovely and, as one gazes upon them, they seem to breathe a spirit of purity which is thought-uplifting. The Christlike work in which you are engaged will certainly be blessed of God for all time, as the good effects are so far-reaching as to be limitless. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a blessing to every home that receives it. It is ennobling and purifying, and being an individual and a home blesser it becomes also a national blessing. May God's richest blessing rest upon you and yours. MRS. G. J. JACKSON.

The Use of Money*

It is likely that few of us who are poor would really make the use of money that we think beforehand that we should. The wise ones tell us that the maddest radicals become conservatives as soon as they inherit fortunes; and many a man who in poverty was sure that he would be a generous giver, could he only have plenty of money, turns out to be close and stingy.

A little boy of five once said to his mother, "When I get to be a big, big man, I'm going to build a g-r-e-a-t house and put all the poor peoples in it."

He thought a moment, then sighed deeply, and remarked, "I think I will not—but prob'ly I'll forget all about it when I get to be a man, sha'n't I, mother?"

"Oh, I hope not, my dear," she answered, greatly shocked.

The child had doubtless heard someone say something regarding the frequent discrepancy between the noble dream of youth and the base reality of manhood, and it had commended itself to his sense of probability.

Alas! to our shame be it said, most of us know that he held the right view, and that the great Schiller had detected a common human need when he cried to his people, "Be true to the dream of thy youth."

It is hard in every department of life to strike the golden mean; but perhaps it is hardest of all in this matter of money. To be sufficiently saving and prudent, so that one may not become dependent upon charity in one's old age, and yet to avoid miserliness and to give our fair proportion of support to worthy causes, seems to be one of the great problems of life.

The wise old Jews were probably right when they estimated that every man should devote a tenth of his income to philanthropy and religion.

A rich man can, and often does, give much more than this. There is no brighter sign in these days than the very prevalent desire manifested among our wealthier classes to do good according to their means.

The world sees the grasping and selfish rich man; and it sees the man whose name as a giver, either through his wish or despite his wish, figures often in the papers. But there is a large class of well-to-do and benevolent people of whose charities even their neighbors know little. Charles Wagner tells us of such an one:

"He had lost a beloved wife, and had seen all his children buried; but he had a great fortune, the result of his own labor.

"Living in the utmost simplicity, he spent his time in searching for opportunities to do good. How many people he surprised in poverty, what means he used for relieving distress and lighting up dark lives, no one can compute. He loved to do good to others, and enjoy their surprise when they did not know whence the relief came. The greater part of these fine deeds were not known till after his death. The whole of them we shall never know. He was a socialist of the right sort."

Most of us can never feel the delight of such a life; but we may all know something which is perhaps better, namely, the reward of a good conscience when we have "rightly divided" our resources, and given to God his share. May we be guided to do this in love and wisdom, "not grudgingly, nor of necessity, for God loveth a cheerful giver."

*Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, March 20. Texts: Luke 12 : 13-21; Matt. 6 : 19-21.

Fighting the Good Fight*

CHRIST was the Prince of Peace; and yet he said, "I came not to bring peace, but a sword."

His meaning needs no explanation to any of us. We all know that he understood well the carnal mind which is enmity against God, and that if we are to imitate Christ and put his precepts into practice it means a perpetual fight.

It is a fight not only with the world about us, but with the inner foes which tempt every man to evil—those powers of the air, which are ofttimes armed with the beauty of a Lucifer, and the specious arguments of a Machiavelli, and are fit to deceive the very elect.

It is time that the world should perceive that this is the only sort of war which modern civilization should know; the war for the possession in each individual soul of Paul's great list of virtues recounted in our text—"righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness."

When each individual has obtained them, there will be no trouble about the nations. It is only another application of the old proverb, "Take care of the pence and the pounds will take care of themselves."

But at present there is great trouble about the attitude of the nations concerning war. From those which we call "heathen" naturally nothing better is usually expected; but from the so-called Christian nations much more is to be expected.

They are full of churches and of schools and colleges. They know that war, unless undertaken at the plain call of freedom and humanity, is degrading and demoralizing. They know that in war the arts languish, education and commerce are set back or stop altogether, and grief, outrage and terror reign.

And yet we see even England and Germany adding Dreadnought to Dreadnought, at fearful expense, though their people are bowing beneath their unendurable taxation.

They know, too, that the modern airship is likely to render all their armaments useless; yet they pile up their national debts for them as none have ever been piled up before.

In our own country the Chief of Staff of the American Army has recently affirmed, according to Justice Brewer, "that we are wasting time in seeking arbitrations, and that the only true course for us to pursue is to make our military and naval strength so great as to be beyond danger of attack."

Another one of our great soldiers has said that "the fewer statesmen and the more ironclads there are, the less would be the danger of war"; or, in other words, the more guns there are, and the fewer people there are who are unwilling to shoot them, the less shooting there will be!

In fact, the Army and Navy people are, as a class, so eager for war that their eyes are holden from the true state of affairs, and their judgment is misled.

"If we had not been foolish enough," continues our great and wise Justice Brewer, "to squander money in ironclads and Army, we might now be a nation without a debt."

Let us all oppose this military spirit, and help on the cause of international arbitration. It is a Christian duty.

Were half the power that fills the world with terror;
Were half the wealth bestowed on camps and courts,
Given to redeem the human mind from error,
There were no need of arsenals or forts.

Write for FREE Sample and Reasons Why Bishopric Wall Board is Cheaper and Better than Lath and Plaster

ANY weather is "good building weather" when you use a Bishopric Wall Board as substitute for lath and plaster. You yourself can nail it to studding; applied dry, all ready for decoration. Saves time and labor; is clean and sanitary; proof against cold and dampness.

BISHOPRIC WALL BOARD

IT IS MADE of kiln-dried, dressed lath, imbedded in hot Asphalt Mastic, and surfaced with sized cardboard. Is cut at the factory into uniform sheets 4 x 4 feet square and three-eighths inch thick. These sheets are easily and quickly nailed to studding ready for wall paper, paint or burlap.

GUARANTEED proof against dampness; will not swell, shrink, warp, crack, flake or blister; is clean, sanitary and odorless. Being a non-conductor, saves fuel and keeps out summer heat; also deadens sound.

Used for dwellings, pleasure, health-resort and factory buildings, new partitions in old buildings, finished attics, cellars, porches, laundries and garages.

Price $2.50 per 100 sq. ft. or $6.40 per crate of 256 sq. ft., f. o. b. factories New Orleans or Cincinnati or Alma, Mich.

Write for FREE SAMPLES AND BOOKLET

BISHOPRIC SHEATHING is made in the same way as Wall Board, but finish is not necessarily so fine and therefore costs less. Cheaper and better than lumber. Forms dead air space between lath and weather board. Ideal for CEMENT EXTERIOR or stucco work.

Excellent lining for dairy barns, poultry houses, stables or other outdoor building. Price $2 per square of 100 sq. ft. or $5.12 per crate of 256 sq. ft., f. o. b. New Orleans, Cincinnati, or Alma, Michigan.

BISHOPRIC ROOFING makes a neat, clean, artistic, durable roof which never needs paint. Guaranteed proof against cold, heat, moisture, wind and weather; will not crack, curl or break.

Price per square: 3-ply, $2.50; 2-ply, $2.25; 1-ply, $1.75. Freight prepaid East of West line of Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Oklahoma and Texas.

DE LAVAL

Cream Separators

This is the record of the DE LAVAL machines, which is of itself a mountain of strength beside which the records of other cream separators are but mole-hills.

It means a feeling of confidence in the purchase of a separator to know that you are putting your money into the machine which was FIRST and which has LED in every single step of cream separator IMPROVEMENT and is today fully ten years in the lead.

It is a satisfaction to know that in buying a DE LAVAL you are not only getting the machine which will DAILY give you the best results, but one of which there are already many thousands an average of TWENTY YEARS in use, while the average life of imitating machines is not over five years and most of the so-called "cheap" machines of today are not likely to last two years.

A De Laval catalogue, to be had for the asking, explains why the De Laval is not only the best but actually the cheapest.

What Ought the World to Be?

By JOHN C. HAVEMEYER

BY the world we mean, of course, the people who are in the world. In their natural condition, which the Bible calls "in the flesh" or "having a carnal mind," all the nations of the world closely resemble each other, and John's declaration is "The whole world lieth in wickedness." Paul's statement is that "all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God," and he very positively declares that "the carnal mind is enmity against God." Let us, then, accept this Bible teaching, that every human being born into the world needs the change to a spiritual mind. "For to be carnally minded is death, to be spiritually minded is life and peace."

The great apostle gives us in Galatians a fearful list of the "works of the flesh," and declares "that they that do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God." This evil life seems to result largely from selfishness, from which Christ came to deliver us, his commandment being "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," or, as Paul expresses it, "Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others." This selfish disposition leads to ambition for power, prominence, and the praise of men in disregard of the welfare and interests of others. Another manifestation is love of money. It is almost incredible that in these days men should make such immense accumulations, often in ways opposed to the rights of others and which may cause injustice and suffering. The money cannot be used in a way to give pleasure to themselves, is not used for the glory of God, and at their death places a responsibility upon others which may be oppressive or which they may be unfitted to assume.

Then there is self-indulgence and love of pleasure, which lead to what is debasing, degrading, and to a life opposed to everything that is pure and lovely. Such, from time immemorial, has been and is now the condition of the world. But what ought the world to be, and what will produce the change? Perhaps our inquiry will be more profitable if we make the question more personal: What have I been and what ought I to do? for, after all, the world is made up of individuals, and reformation means a change in individual heart and life. There is only one remedy, or one way of escape, from this condemnation, which is passed upon all: "For all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God."

Jesus Christ is the one and only way: "Neither is there salvation in any other; for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved."

How shall we describe or even fully appreciate the necessity and advantage of this salvation for every human being? How can we fail to make it the first object of our thought and effort? We have simply to recognize God as our Creator, upon whom we depend for the supply of all our needs, and accept his way of securing pardon for our sins, of deliverance from Satan's control, and the godliness which has the "promise of the life that now is and of that which is to come."

Let us each now accept the truth that "every good tree bringeth forth good fruit, but a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit." "By their fruits ye shall know them." What does our daily life show us to be? The test is a simple one. In a few words Christ tells us what God requires: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and strength, and thy neighbor as thyself." A searching inquiry is made in John's First Epistle: "For he that loveth not his brother, whom he hath seen, how can he love God, whom he hath not seen? And this commandment have we from him, That he that loveth God love his brother also." Life is a fearful responsibility, and we cannot trifle with God, to whom we owe it and who has the right to complete obedience. What a pity it is that we are not more clearly taught that service to God is not only a duty, but also a great privilege! We make a great deal of having good associates and pleasant companionship in our labors, but God invites us to be coworkers with himself and promises rewards which will last through eternity. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him."

Let us consider the fact that all around us are men, women, and even children, who are living as if there were no God. As a result iniquity abounds everywhere. Murder, robbery, deceit, oppression and betrayal of trust are on the one hand, and destitution, ignorance, vice and suffering are on the other. As we have been reminded, the only cure is Jesus Christ, who tells us we are his witnesses. Christ's gift to his disciples is his own peace. By his Spirit he gives them a spiritual vision and a joy the world can neither give nor take away. He cleanses us from all sin; he makes us kings and priests, and this is to be our testimony: "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance; against such there is no law." Are we giving this testimony daily to our children, to our relatives, neighbors, friends, business associates, the poor and degraded, the drunkards, and the sick, suffering and tempted?

A recent authority gives the numbers in the world, according to creed, as follows:

Worshipers of Ancestors and Confucius	256,000,000
Hinduism	190,000,000
Mohammedanism	176,800,000
Buddhism	147,900,000
Taoism, Shintoism, Judaism and Polytheism	181,700,000
Christianity	477,000,000
	1,429,400,000

Christianity is divided, by the same authority:

Catholics	230,800,000
Protestants	143,200,000
Greek Church and others	103,000,000
	477,000,000

The figures are startling indeed, but we have the command to go forth, and in His name conquer the world. It is TROY CHEMICAL CO., Binghamton, N. Y.: I used "Save-The-Horse" as you directed on the place where the horse was kicked and he recovered entirely from lameness. A week afterward he went lame in hind leg, and he was very lame. I had a doctor examine him and he said he had a blind jack. As I had some "Save-The-Horse" left he advised me to use it, which I did, and he is perfectly sound. This jack came on the leg that was sound, for, if you remember, he had a bone spavin on the other leg some time ago. I have had tough luck with this horse, but your remedy has always given him a cure. I thank you for your kindness, always willing to give advice, and I shall always recommend "Save-The-Horse" highly. WHAT OUGHT THE WORLD TO BE?

the divine command, and there is behind it divine power. The number of the Mohammedans is stated to be over 176,000,000, and this is what one man accomplished by his determined effort to make the world his followers. Instead of being discouraged we should rather rejoice over the great field upon which we are commanded to enter.

I believe that a great need of the present time is faith. We do not fully rely upon God's promises of aid, and do not have the confidence which is a condition of success. Surely the Bible teaches that God requires full surrender and obedience. "He that offendeth in one point is guilty of all." To be fit for service we should "seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness" in everything. Every part of our life should be thus consecrated, and I suggest the question whether we can consistently attend the theatre, spend our precious hours in card-playing or dancing, or use money and time in burning tobacco. Jesus said that Nathanael was "an Israelite indeed, in whom was no guile." There should be no guile in us in this world, for in the world to come there will be no "spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing." We heartily sing the hymn, "Oh for a Heart to Praise My God." Have we a right to offer the prayer it contains without expectation of receiving the highest spiritual gift? It is true we also sing "Nearer, My God, to Thee"; yes, through time and eternity, I understand the Bible to teach we will become more like God. Faith and love will be developed, and we will grow stronger, and the time will come when we shall see Jesus and become like him, for we shall see him as he is.

Do You Read Advertisements?

ONE of our subscribers has taken us to task as follows: "We look for your paper every week with delight, but we wil' have to admit that we did not enjoy the last week's paper very much; we thought there were too many advertisements for a Christian paper."

Now, dear friends, do you know that if it were not for those very advertisements we would not be able to give you so large, so ably edited, so well illustrated a CHRISTIAN HERALD as the one you now so much admire?

When you buy THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for $1.50 a year you are receiving much greater value than could ordinarily be produced for that price, and it is because of the revenue derived from the advertisements that we are enabled to give you so much more for the money.

In other words, when we give you an extra number of pages of reading matter we are compelled to carry a proportionate increase in advertising space in order to make up the difference in expense. And so, the more advertising, the greater the amount of extra reading matter.

Furthermore, the modern art of advertising has progressed until the business pages of the up-to-date magazine have become as interesting from the reader's standpoint as the editorial pages. People who are not in the habit of reading the advertising pages may not realize this, but the fact is that the advertising pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are subjected to the most careful scrutiny, and no advertisement is accepted for publication until it has passed muster in every way as to its strict adherence to the truth.

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within one month of the date of the appearance of the advertisement is ready to mail. It will be sent to any person interested in fruit-growing on receipt of 7 cents to cover postage. The Stark Year Book for 1910 represents an entirely new idea in nurserymen's literature—it is a work of art as well as a catalogue of Stark Nursery products. Within its covers are 32 full-page illustrations of fruits and flowers, representing 175 varieties, done in four colors, and exactly reproducing nature. 84 pages are devoted to descriptions, prices, and records.

Stark Delicious, the apple that has revolutionized orchard planting and established a new standard of apple values (selling at $10.00 per bushel box this year); Stark King David, another apple of wondrous quality and merit; Stark King Philip, a hardy black grape of California grape quality, and dozens of the very best things in the horticultural world are fully described, illustrated, and priced.

To any one planting one tree or many, of fruits or ornamental, this book is of inestimable value—a horticultural text-book—a guide to proper selection.

Stark trees have stood the supreme test of actual planting for 85 years—they are the yard-stick by which all other nursery products are measured—they are the first choice of this country's most successful orchardists. The success of the orchard is dependent on the kind and quality of tree planted. Stark varieties are the best of the best. Our record of 85 years of successful selling is a positive guarantee of tree quality.

Before you decide to buy, send 7 cents for the Stark Year Book—do it today before the edition is exhausted.

Greatest Offer in Real Estate History!

TEN YEARS from now New York City will have added to its population a city the size of Boston, Baltimore and San Francisco combined. That means that a million and a half new people must have houses, stores, churches, schools, theatres—all the elements of city life—on land now within the limits of New York City.

Ten years ago, all New York was valued by the Board of Assessors at three billion dollars—to-day, at seven billions. That is to say, those who own the land of New York have added four billion dollars, or 133% at least, to their personal wealth in 10 years.

Ten years ago we offered lots in what was then an unimproved district of this great city for $440 each. Some of these lots have since sold for over $3,000 each.

The big fortunes in real estate are made (and Andrew Carnegie says, "Few can now be made from any other source") by buying cheap land near dear land. The dearest land in the country is at Wall Street and Broadway. The cheapest land in New York City—distance, improvements and transportation considered—is Richmond Borough, only 45 minutes from Wall Street, at South New York. $5 starts you, and the balance can be paid in easy monthly payments of $5.

The Staten Island movement has only just begun. Will you get aboard now—or wait?

NEW YORK CITY

is Made up of five Boroughs:

Manhattan Brooklyn Bronx Queens Richmond.

SOUTH NEW YORK

is in the Borough of Richmond, formerly Staten Island.

Questions and Answers

In forwarding MSS. to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, enclose stamped envelopes for return, if unavailable.

Rev. J. C. Quinn, of Trinity Church, Antrim, Pa., sends this verse:

"God bless our going out, nor less
Our coming in, and make them sure;
God bless our daily bread, and bless
Whate'er we do, whate'er endure;
In death unto His peace awake us,
And heirs of His salvation make us."

This, he writes, is a stanza of a German hymn, very popular in England and Scotland some years ago, and used as grace before meals.

Subscriber, Plymouth, N. C. Please explain Matt. 20: 19. Who are the "Gentiles" referred to? Did not the Jews crucify Jesus?

After the trial and condemnation of Jesus he was delivered to the Roman soldiers. It was those Romans who performed the act of crucifixion, which was peculiarly a Roman form of capital punishment. See Mark 15: 15-24 and related passages. Thus, not the Jews alone, but the Gentiles—the two great divisions of the human race, for all outside the Hebrew faith were classed as Gentiles—were responsible for his death.

C. H. K., Jersey City, N. J. Kindly advise me if it is lawful for a concern to ask for, or to advise the amount of money due them, on a postal card? Also, money asked for on Sunday, can payment be demanded?

"Dunning" by postal card will probably get the dunner into trouble. The law is not settled everywhere on this point, but courts frown on the practice. As to Sunday law in New Jersey, see a lawyer in that State.

R. B., Speedwell, Tenn. 1. What is meant by "living and reigning" with Christ a thousand years in Rev. 20th chapter? 2. What will become of the heathen who have never heard the Gospel? 3. Will this earth ever be destroyed?

1. The whole chapter describes the millennium. Verses 4, 5 and 6 refer to the martyrs and the faithful who have not bowed to the world power, but have looked to the things unseen and eternal. These will "live and reign" with Christ during the millennium. As Christ once gave his disciples authority to judge the tribes of Israel, so he, in like manner, when he comes, will choose those who are to take part with him and bear authority in his kingdom on earth. 2. The heathen, who have not heard the Gospel, will be judged justly but not according to the same standard as those who have heard it. Their faith and works will not go for naught. In all ages, and in every land, God has had witnesses for himself. 3. See Rev. 6: 12-17; II. Peter 3: 10; Heb. 1: 11 and other passages.

J. N. O., Moundsville, W. Va. 1. In answer to L. L. S., Granthurst, Ont., concerning church choirs, you make use of the expression, "The Psalms, which are the old Jewish hymnal," etc. Should that not be the hymnal used by the church to-day? 2. When Christ and his disciples "sang a hymn and went out," what did they sing?

1. In some of the old "Covenanting" churches, the Psalms of David in metrical form are still in use, and many passages have been set to modern music by great composers as oratorios, etc. 2. The hymn which our Lord and his disciples sang at the Last Supper before going out to the Mount of Olives, is generally believed to have been a part of the Hallel, or series of Psalms sung by the Jews on the night of the Passover, comprehending Psalms 113 and 118. They were chanted, probably in unison.

J. W. W., Scranton, Pa. Please advise through your columns whether there is a law on the statute books in the State of New York prohibiting the reading of the Bible in the public schools?

There is no statute in New York State prohibiting the reading of the Bible in the public schools, but the reading must be without note or comment. There is no such decision (as stated in the clipping you sent), in the State of New York.

S. G. S., St. Paul, Minn. I have a class of boys in Sunday School, and in order to make it more interesting would like to find short stories or incidents bearing on the subject of each lesson. Will you recommend some good ones?

No one book is likely to contain such matter as you seek. As in nearly everything else that is important, hard work is all that will help you. Go to some good library, and with the assistance of a librarian, hunt for thrilling and lively tales. For instance, for the lesson of February 20, on Daniel's choice, study the lives of the great temperance leaders. You are sure to find something good. Then generally (not always) tell your stories, rather than read them. For a lesson on disobedience, read or tell Mrs. Mary Wilkins Freeman's beautiful story of Uncle Sammy. For one on conduct in the home, read Mrs. Sangster's poem Our Own. For a lesson on Moral Courage, read Lowell's Present Crisis. For Missionary Lessons, there are wonderful stories in the lives of Paton, Livingstone, Judson and others. There is no royal road to making Sunday School lessons interesting—nor, for that matter, anything else. Hard labor on the part of the teacher or worker is all that will do it. The teachers most beloved and successful are generally those who put the most of thought and work into the lessons.

E. V. G., Laclede, Ill. Does impeachment disfranchise an American citizen? Can a citizen be impeached without proving him guilty?

No. It does not disfranchise him. An impeached official is disqualified to hold another office. Only high officials are liable to impeachment, and in general they must be proved guilty of some crime. Failure to prove that he had committed any crime saved Andrew Johnson. If, however, the requisite majority of the tribunal (usually two-thirds), before whom the trial takes place, votes for impeachment, the official would have no redress.

J. W. S., Hull, Ill. 1. What States forbid cousins marrying? 2. Would it be a sin for cousins to go from a State where the laws forbid them marrying, and get married, and then return and live where it was forbidden?

1. Alaska, Arizona, Arkansas, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Missouri, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Washington, and Wyoming. 2. It would not be a crime under the law.

Reader. The Great Pyramid of Egypt—the entrance closed so that no mark was left to tell where it was, the top built up to a point, the sides of uniform slope and smoothness! Astronomer Proctor points out an aspect of the heavens in 3350 B.C. more favorable for the time of its construction than 2170 B.C. Has any other commented upon the possibility or probability, or a belief, that it was built before the Flood? Would such a structure—so built—probably withstand the action of the waters of the Deluge?

We have referred this question to Professor S. P. Leland, who answers as follows: "Much speculation has been indulged in regarding the purpose of the builders of the Great Pyramid. We are yet only in the field of speculation regarding it. If its peculiar form were designed to mark some particular date by the position of the planets or stars, it is too indefinite to be of value. Should it be ascertained that by the precession of the equinoxes, the occurrence of an eclipse, the conjunction of planets in some particular constellation, or any other phenomenon was seemingly indicated by the direction of some opening, or the position of some stone, it is generally regarded safer to presume it a coincidence or an accident than to be serious enough upon which to base a conclusion of its age or purpose. Such correspondences might occur without any design. Some astronomers have suggested the possibility of thus determining its age, but nothing sufficiently definite has yet been discovered to inspire much confidence among scientists. The foundation of the vast structure is so deeply and firmly laid, and is so broad and unified in such a solid mass, that it would probably withstand the action of the waters of the Deluge."

Mrs. F. B., Waupaca Co., Wis. What are the "romaines" which are quoted in vegetable market reports?

Some varieties of lettuce are known as "romaines." In the commonest "romaine," the white central vein is greatly enlarged, and the leaf is long and narrow.

M. H., Red Hook, N. J. Will you inform me as to the laws regulating inheritance from parent to child? Is there any tax upon such property?

A child inherits real estate, subject to mother's right of dower, or father's right of curtesy, and receives in New York two-thirds of personal property if either parent survives; if both parents are dead, he takes all the personal property. In New Jersey, there is no tax on succession by child; in New York, the tax is one per cent.

L. M., Iowa Falls, Ia. If a woman dies, leaving a lawfully adopted son, would he receive her share of her father's property, if said father dies intestate?

This question should be put to an Iowa lawyer, as it is affected by several circumstances not disclosed.

Hon. Victor Murdock

AMONG the members of Congress there are many, indeed we might safely say a large majority, who are men of strong Christian principles and who do not hesitate, at every proper opportunity, to proclaim their spiritual allegiance. One of the younger line of Congressmen, a brilliant speaker, an able debater and a keen observer of men and measures, is Victor Murdock, who represents the Eighth Kansas District. To Congressman Murdock the question was put:

"Is the spirit of Jesus more dominant in business and public affairs than when you entered active life, and is it an advantage or not for a public man to-day to be known as a professing Christian?"

His reply gives the confident view of one experienced in public affairs, who notes the undercurrents of our national life:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
WASHINGTON, D. C.

My Dear Sir: December 11, 1909.

I have your letter of December 8. I believe there is no one given to analytical observation of the nation and its people who does not believe that the strongest fibre in the country's being, that fibre being the ideals of the democracy, has its origin in and is preserved by the teachings of Jesus Christ. That the nation is advancing, no one who is rational can gainsay; that the inspiration of that advancement is the lesson of the Man of Galilee, and that the measure of the step forward is the perfection of his life, is absolutely true. It is just as plain to be seen in the slow evolutions of great governmental machinery as we have it here in Washington, as it is in the community life of a village. It is least observable in that portion of the nation, wherever located, which is given to waste and luxury; but even there it is apparent, and will, no doubt, upon occasion be called back to vitality and effectiveness. Yours truly,

Victor Murdock

C. S., Philadelphia, Pa. The Old Testament covers approximately four thousand years of recorded history, irrespective of the Creation period, to which the Bible assigns no date, merely saying "in the beginning." The New Testament covers a portion of the first century A.D.

J. G., Dover, N. J. For all available information concerning the pagan holy days we refer you to any good encyclopedia. We are not aware that any ancient nation or people, except the Jews, observed the Sabbath, or day of worship, in the same manner or with the same degree of regularity.

L. C., Narvon, Pa. The life-stream of the whole human race is one, flowing from the same source, and they are all brothers, children of the same heavenly Father. The color of the skin is determined by exterior causes, climate, etc., and cannot affect the main contention of the apostle, as set forth in Acts 17:26-29.

G. H., Dow, Ill. Beecher (on baptism) says "the same term is used to express the various ablutions among the Jews, such as sprinkling, pouring, washing before meals, cleansing pots, etc." Sprinkling is mentioned as an act of purification in Isa. 52:15, Ezek. 36:25, and Heb. 9:13, 14. In the New Testament the same term is used in "baptized with fire and the Holy Ghost" that is employed in individual baptism. It is pointed out by able commentators (who hold that all three methods may have been employed in early Bible times) that the baptism of the Philippian jailer, and that in the house of Cornelius, could hardly have been by immersion, and that wherever large numbers of converts of both sexes were baptized the difficulties would have been very great.

GOLDEN TREASURY

For the Children of God. By Bogatzky

HERE is a book of which millions of copies have been sold, and which has been a spiritual comfort to millions of people. It has been translated into nearly all European languages, and, with the exception of The Pilgrim's Progress, no book outside of the Bible has been so largely circulated or so widely read.

This helpful volume contains 365 pages—or one for every day in the year—and each page contains a Scriptural Text, a simple spiritual exposition of the same, and a hymn of praise and encouragement. For daily use in a godly household at family worship, as a daily monitor, and as a source of strength and wisdom, Bogatzky's Golden Treasury will be found invaluable.

Upon receipt of 25 Cents we will send Golden Treasury for the Children of God, beautifully bound in White Vellum and Gold, all charges prepaid. There are 1,200 copies left, and only those who act promptly will be fortunate in securing one. Address To-day:

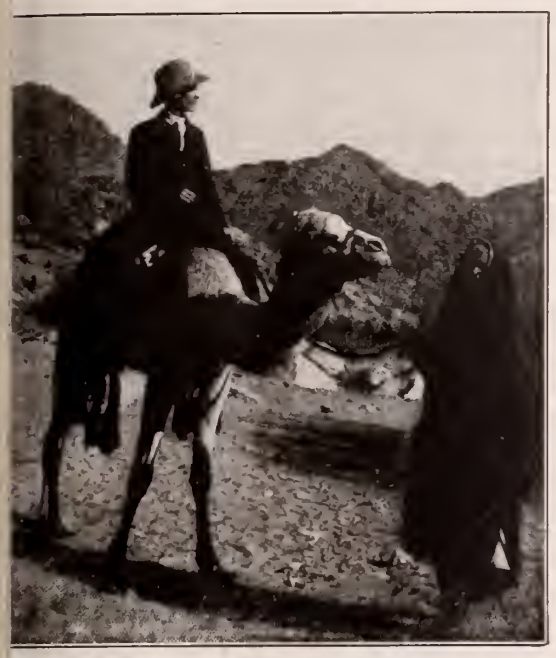
SCALING MOUNT SINAI'S SUMMIT

By PROF. R. J. ROBINSON

Who Made the Ascent



Our Correspondent in the Wilderness of Sinai

Jebel-Mousa, the "Mount of Moses"

Arab Women on the Summit of Sinai

THE ancient name of the mountain that to-day is called by the Arabs "Jebel Mousa" (the "Mount of Moses") was Horeb or Sinai. It lies in the heart of the Sinaitic Peninsula; and, though it rises from the earth in one broad mass, it lifts three separate peaks to heaven. This group, consisting of Ras-es-Safsafa (the "Head of the Willow-tree"), Jebel Mousa and Jebel Catarina, belongs to the same primary foundation, and are of more than ordinary interest to us because it was from the summit of one of them that, hidden by the thick cloud of smoke, God spoke to Moses "face to face," and presented him with the Ten Commandments, only to have them broken in pieces a moment later at the feet of idolatrous Israel.

Fortunately, by comparing the record of Holy Writ and the topography of the district, we are left in no reasonable doubt as to which of the three peaks was the scene of the momentous event. The magnificent peak of Ras-es-Safsafa, rising like a huge altar "before the eyes of the whole congregation," springing aloft in lonely grandeur from the level of the broad plain at its base, and clearly visible from end to end of the entire plain, of necessity must be "the mount that might not be touched," and from which "the voice of God" might be distinctly heard by the trembling Israelites below. Here also, in awful grandeur and absolute separation from human life, withdrawn from all earthly stir and confusion, one could more easily than anywhere else make a model of "the end of the world." But aside from fact and theory, tradition has ever kept true to this three-headed Mount of Sinai, and we certainly were not inclined to doubt its authority. We are forced to the conclusion that Mount Safsafa, which faces the plain, is the place whence Moses spoke to the people, with his face shining from the presence of God, as he descended from the somewhat higher top of Jebel Mousa, that rises immediately behind, half hidden by its two companions from the popular gaze.

The path to the top of the Holy Mountain (which rises 7,363 feet above the sea level) is known as the "Steps of the Pilgrims." There are 3,000 steps in all, that lead from the little convent door of St. Catherina in a fairly straight line to its summit. Half way up we pass under the narrow archway built between two perpendicular rocks, where sits a priest who hears confessions from and gives absolution to all who journey up the mount. Just beyond, and in a secluded plain immediately below the highest point of Jebel Mousa, we notice the tall, slim head of a solitary cypress. It serves to keep fresh in memory one visitant to this wild region, who was forced hither both by circumstances and his own character—the prophet Elijah. Here is located the scene of the address to Elijah, where the great prophet saw in vision the wind which rent the solid mountain, and broke in pieces the cliffs, followed by earthquake and fire, and then in the absolute silence of this desert waste "the still small voice (I. Kings 19:9-13).

A thousand feet higher, and we stand on the sacred summit itself—upon a spot which is connected with one of the greatest epochs ever recorded in the world's history. The view takes in the whole of the peninsula, from the Gulf of Akaba on the east to the Red Sea coast on the west, from the glittering waters of the Gulf on the far south only to lose itself in the sandstone wilderness to the north —the desert of the wanderings. On all sides rise a gigantic wildness of stone, a chaos of mountains, of naked rocks and barren gullies, varying in color from black and darkest red to a soft rose tint and silver gray, and the sunlit summits and shady cliffs give variety of light and shade, the whole composing a picture of indescribable beauty and majesty.

A SERMON BY

Rev. Charles Aubrey Eaton, D.D.*

The Opportunity and Peril of American Christianity

TEXT—Matt. 16:18

"Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it."

WHATEVER interpretation we may place upon these words there can be no doubt that they reveal in the mind of the Master a most exalted conception of the church, coupled with an acute consciousness of the terrific struggles through which the church must pass in order to fulfil its mission in the world. Against that body of redeemed men the unseen powers of spiritual evil will always war. But founded upon eternal, personal truth, and buttressed by the love of God, the Church of Christ will stand immovable and undismayed. To follow Jesus is to walk the way of Gethsemane and the cross. To win a spiritual victory, we must fight a spiritual battle. The glorious promise is that we shall win through the might of Him who hath all power in heaven and in earth.

Unity of American Christianity

In the time of change and stress through which we are now passing in this country it will stimulate our drooping faith to stop and study the possessions, achievements and larger relationships of the Christian Church. Of especial value is such an exercise to the ministry. The tendency of our calling is toward localism in effort and parochialism in thought. But we must refuse to be set off in a corner, insulated from the main stream of progress by sectarian differences. American Christianity is in essence one. The good of one church, or of one Christian, is the good of all. The failure of one reduces the fighting force of all. Our work is one. Our message is one. Our destiny is one. We serve one Lord; we live by one Spirit; we ally our lives with the one purpose of the one God and Father of us all.

When depressed and almost smothered by the petty cares and trivial duties of parish life, it is therefore good for the preacher, and good, too, for the layman, to claim his heritage in the present kingdom of Christ; and leaving the shallow eddies of the local church, launch his ship upon the broad stream of God's unfolding plan for the world. In the light of this experience no man who serves Jesus faithfully can be insignificant. There are no great and no small fields. All are a part of the one mighty army of God.

To those who anxiously inquire, "What is the matter with the church?" while carefully refraining from touching with the tip of their finger the church's burden, let us reply, "The church is a part of the age in which it lives. It reflects the tragic struggle of men to readjust themselves to conditions which in this one generation represent profounder change in thought and experience than the world has known in thousands of years before. We are trying to conserve what is true in the old, while finding room and welcome for what is true in the new. We may abandon many secondary positions, change the plan of campaign and fight with new weapons, but the main citadel of our faith we will never surrender."

The Onward March of the Church

A glance at Dr. Carroll's digest of the last religious census in this country ought to reassure those literary onlookers who, with carefully simulated sorrow, bemoan the decadence of American Christianity. We number many millions. We are one of the largest, if not the largest, holders of real estate. We act as trustees of vast resources. We employ an army of workers, the product of whose toil adds directly to the spiritual and moral possessions of the world. Apart from the public schools, we control the greatest educational equipment in the world. We lead in philanthropy and relief. We are the pathfinders for political and economic empire. In a word, American Christianity, with all its faults and failures, still shines, the one supreme light upon the turbulent tides of human development. Our church life in essence is evangelical. No other type of Christianity seems to accord with the practical American spirit. There are many echoes, and multitudinous sporadic superstitions, but the great mass of our Christian people rest their lives upon a simple, personal faith in Jesus Christ as their Redeemer and Lord.

The first opportunity of American Christianity lies in its enormous wealth, its widespread culture, and its social prestige. If the apostolic church, without these gifts, could transform a world, what limit is there to our achievements? One duty of the pulpit is to encourage rich men to give up active business life, and put their energies and resources into the glorious work of the kingdom. If money-makers only knew when they had enough, and would furnish good causes with their personal leadership and support, instead of staying in the financial battle until they die, many of our religious and social problems would find speedy solution.

Another opportunity before American Christianity is the immigrant. God is sending to our very doors millions of needy lives. They will respond to a worthy Gospel. They give us a simple and apostolic type of Christianity when converted and organized into churches. To leave them unevangelized is to smother our national spirit and imperil our national future. To lead them to faith in Christ is to strengthen every good institution of our land by the introduction of new types of church experience. The immigrant is here, and here to stay. He will become a blessing or a curse according to the spiritual ideas and forces which master him. He can be reached by the churches. This fact is in itself a unique and glorious opportunity.

The Battle-Line Against Evil

There is a growing sense of unity among American churches, which means enlarged opportunity. We can now mass our forces in a general attack upon the forces of universal evil. There are many things which ought to be done, and which only a united Christianity can do. The problem of intemperance, of the social evil, gambling, civic betterment, proper public school education, the questions of poverty and wealth; in a word, the whole social problem of our civilization, can only be solved by concerted action on the part of all Christians. This is becoming possible by the wonderful growth of Christian brotherhood among men of different creeds, who forget secondary differences in the consciousness of a common experience in Christ.

One of the most marvelous changes which have come in the twentieth century may be described as a world consciousness. With bewildering rapidity the wall of separation which has stood through the long millenniums between races, nations and continents has broken down. The key to our age is China. With 400,000,000 of people, quite the equal of any other 400,000,000 in the world as far as intellectual equipment is concerned, China will play a tremendous part in world politics from now on. Hungry for this great market, Western nations are clamoring at her closed doors. These doors will open to let us in, and at the same time they will let China out. It is said that this great people has advanced more in the last ten years than Japan has in fifty. When the tremendous impact of China's life is felt upon Western civilization, its result will be determined largely by the spiritual temper of the Chinese race. This is a supreme opportunity for American Christianity. It will only come once; it will soon be gone forever. Now is the acceptable time. China can be won for Christ in this generation. It is a great common task for the great common Church of Christ. For American Christianity to fail at this moment is to prove recreant to our solemn obligations, and to miss the opportunity for which the church has been kept alive through the centuries.

The first peril resting upon our churches to-day is that of a materialistic blindness. We are in danger of failing to see the potency of spiritual and moral forces. In the next few years races will be hurled one against the other with fearful impact. It is absolutely true that the force of this impact can be modified only by spiritual agencies. If the Christian Church loses faith in its own proposition, it will stand dumbly by, and miss its one supreme opportunity to demonstrate on a world-wide scale the power of Christ over human lives.

The peril of racial and social antipathies, all alien to the spirit of Christ, is heavy upon our churches to-day. I believe we can escape from this shadow; but that escape can be brought about only by a relearning of the real spirit and message of our Master. We are in peril also of misunderstanding our religion, making it a matter of theologic hair-splitting or ecclesiastical machinery, where in the mind of Christ it is a world-wide, heave high energy inbreathed by the wisdom and lo of God.

Worldliness in Church Life

Perhaps the chief peril which confronts the Ame ican Church to-day is that of a trifling, sord church life. By this I mean a certain professio alism in the pulpit, and a childish conception religious duty and privilege in the pew.

When a man enlists in the army he takes sacred obligations. If in the midst of a battle were to quit fighting because the drill sergeant d not call him by his right name, he would not be sh I do not think he would be even hanged. Th would simply throw him into the ditch, away fr the sight of noble men. But a full-grown man w unite with the Christian Church, assuming the mc sacred, binding and exalted obligations in the wor On the slightest pretext he will quit. Perhaps t minister has not recognized him on the street, o of the deacons failed to call him by name in t church, he is asked for money, or he does not li the choir. Any trivial pretext will do. Imm diately he disregards every solemn obligation. you were to tell him that his sin is worse than pe jury, he would be insulted. Yet it is. If you we to tell him that his disloyalty in this regard is mo despicable than the disloyalty of a traitor to h country, he would not believe you. Yet it is. Th trivial, shallow conception of church obligation responsible for the fact that the world does not ta the church seriously. Why should it? If the sacred obligations, publicly made, mean nothing the man who makes them, why should they me anything to the outside world?

I firmly believe that the comparative powerles ness of the church in the face of supreme opport nity is due to this one weakness, more than to a other. How can a strong, self-respecting young m be attracted to the Christian ministry when he se the necessity of dwarfing his life by standards a ideals so trivial and absurd? If great laymen lea the impression that they do not believe in their ov proposition, why should they complain about t masses refusing to be reached? If this trivial, se ondary attitude of mind were characteristic of t entire life of church members, the matter would different. But unfortunately countless thousan who claim allegiance to some church, give every ev dence of passion and interest in money-making, the pursuit of learning, in social pleasures and quest for social place. Men sacrifice and work f the thing they believe in. If a large proportion our church membership do nothing for the chur except to misrepresent it before the world, it is b cause they do not believe in the thing they s they do.

The Church, the Arbiter of Destiny

With such an opportunity presented to us, in t shadow of such perils, earnest-minded men mu give themselves to serious thought and action. T day has gone by for fine phrases. We must kno the truth, if the truth is to make us free. The are great numbers of earnest-minded men and wor en in our churches who will welcome eagerly son escape from the sordid and banal. This escape possible only by a return to the simplicity of t Christianity of Christ. We must have in pulp and pew a simple, childlike trust in the Lord Jes as our personal Redeemer from sin. We must ha also a conscious glad surrender of our entire lives his Lordship. We must summon our powers unt we are able to grasp, in some measure at least, t vast outlines of his stupendous thought for the r demption of mankind. We must give ourselv without reserve to him and to his enterprise, glor ing in hardships and burdens for his dear sak We are sure that this spiritual passion, sanely live would transform the world. As never before, may truthfully be said that the Church of Chri holds the destiny of the race in its hands. The chi peril of American Christianity is the America Church. The only hope of American Christiani is the American Church.

Side by side, on the top of this moun-ace of prayer for both Christians d Moslems, a fact reproduced no-here else throughout the Mohammen world, except within the walls of e convent below, where Mohammen devotees and Christian pilgrims eel together and pray.

The descent proves easier than the y up. When half way down, those o desire to extend their journey as to include Ras-es-Safsafa turn to e left, and in passing through a val-y discover the spring near which ows the sacred willow which gives a me to the mountain. Tradition and e Bedouin declare this to be the idenal tree from which Moses cut his raculous rod. Beyond this peak, d in the wild valley of the Leja, here the Israelitish camp was tched, is the most famous of all the lics, the "Rock of Moses." The rock 18 to 20 feet high, slightly inclined, rough indentature running over each le, which is intersected here and ere by slits, and the stone is worn ay in places as if from the effects running water. It is beyond doubt e oldest known legendary object in e vicinity. The Koran refers to this k more than once, and from this t arises the reverence of the Bed-in, who hold it sacred. From the ddle Ages onward it has been vis-d by Christian pilgrims, who have lented rude crosses on its sides. Of the objects in this desert it is the st closely bound up with the simple th of its inhabitants and its early itants.

At a later date, another traveler ssed through Arabia, and without ubt visited this mount. "I went into abia," says Paul in exhorting the latians to repentance; and a little er we hear these words, "This Har is Mount Sinai in Arabia." We d it impossible not to believe that he,
, must have stood on the rocks of nai.

It is for the most part true that the ire history of the Peninsula of Sinai confined to the Exodus. Yet we st remember that this land is the lest of the holy places, and that the lo of that first glory has clung about long after the events themselves ve passed away.

uld be to the heart of Lincoln. In sponse to her moving persuasion, he d to Mrs. Lurton:

"'I will give orders for his release.'
t,' said the importunate mother, u know how long it sometimes takes

'Mr. Lincoln immediately wrote out

d let him go home with his mother.'"

THE CHILDREN'S PALM SUNDAY

By Rev. J. M. FARRAR, D.D.*

THE first Palm Sunday was a day of great enthusiasm. Is the word "enthusiasm" too long and strong for my juniors? Then we will take it apart and let you look at it. The Greeks made this word "enthusiasm" by putting two words into one word. Their word "en" means in and "theos" means God. They joined them in one word "entheos," Godin. When they were very happy, and wanted to shout and rejoice, they said it was their God in them that made them happy. The English of "entheos" is "enthusiasm." When God is in our hearts we are happy, we want to shout for joy, we are enthusiastic. Now you have had a lesson in Greek.

ON the first Palm Sunday morning crowds of enthusiastic men and women followed Jesus from Bethany to Jerusalem. We say men and women, for we do not read of any children being with them. I believe there were children with Christ on his way to Jerusalem. Probably the fathers and mothers shouted so loud that the children were not heard. We know that when Christ entered the city the children were with him and were helping him. In the morning it was Palm Sunday; in the afternoon it was Hosanna Sunday. When all was going well with Christ and every one was happy, the men and women followed him, waving palm branches. In the afternoon the people who had stores and shops in God's house got very angry because Christ drove them out and upset their tables. Then we read, not of men and women, but of the children who were there to help Christ. They shouted "Hosanna to our King!" They were enthusiastic; God was in their hearts.

THESE children were not able to overturn the tables of the money-changers and to upset the seats of those who sold doves. But the children did help Christ by cheering him when he was doing this great work. I believe the cheers of the children made Christ stronger for the work of Palm Sunday. The wicked people were angry at the children. They knew the boys and girls were helping Christ. "Stop them! Stop them!" cried the wicked men. Christ said, "No! No!" Their cries and shouts were perfect praise. They were helping Christ. A lad helped Christ to feed the five thousand and a little child helped him when he needed an illustration about the kingdom of heaven. The lad furnished the five loaves and two fishes, and the little child was used as a kingdom illustration. Your pastor believes Christ needed the children's encouragement when he was cleansing the temple. He needed their shouts. "And the children." He had need of them.

THE boys of a certain Sunday School were dressed up in their uniforms for a parade, and the girls in their best dresses were lined along the sidewalk to see the parade. One boy cut his foot, and said to the captain: "Captain, I've cut my foot, and I cannot march with the brigade to-day." "Well, George," the captain answered, "if you cannot march, you can stand on the corner anyway and shout 'Hurrah!' when we come along." "Yes, I'll do that, anyway," promised George; and so, when the brigade came along, he took off his hat and shouted as loud as he could, "Hurrah! Hurrah! Hurrah!" When Christ was cleasing his Father's house the children were shouting, "Hosanna to the Son of David." "And the children." Three cheers for the children. They were happy.

A PRETTY story is related of the late Dr. Phillips Brooks, Bishop of Massachusetts. He had long been a favorite with a little girl of five, the daughter of a parishioner, and she was always delighted if she happened to meet him when out for a walk. The day the Bishop died her mother came into the room where the child was playing and, holding the bright little face between her hands, said, tearfully, "Bishop Brooks has gone to heaven." "Oh, mamma," was the reply, "How happy the angels will be!" Christ made not the angels only, but the children in heaven happy when he went back to them. One reason Christ loved the children so much on earth was because they reminded him of the children in heaven. You will find what I mean in the following story:

"YES, indeed, we have some queer little incidents happen to us," said the engine-driver, as he plied his oilcan about and under his machine. "A queer thing happened to me about a year ago. You'd think it queer for a rough man like me to cry for ten minutes, and nobody hurt, either, wouldn't you? Well, I did, and I almost cry every time I think of it. I was running along one afternoon pretty lively when I approached a little village where the track cuts through the streets. I slackened up a little, but was still making good speed, when suddenly, about twenty rods ahead of me, a little girl, not more than three years old, toddled onto the track. In ten seconds more it would all have been over. After reversing and applying the brake, I shut my eyes. I didn't want to see any more. As we slowed down my fireman laughed and shouted to me: 'Jim, look here!' I looked, and there was a big, black Newfoundland dog, holding the little girl in his mouth, leisurely walking toward the house where she evidently belonged. She was kicking and crying, so that I knew she wasn't hurt, and the dog had saved her. My fireman thought it funny and kept on laughing, but I cried. She reminded me of a dear little girl in my far-away home." The children's Palm Sunday! God bless our children! Christ loves them and needs them, every one.

Roosevelt's Long Hunt

EX-PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT and his party sailed down the Nile from Gondokoro February 28, and expect to reach Khartoum this week. With their departure the African scientific expedition under the auspices of the Smithsonian Institution of Washington was practically brought to a close. The results from the points of view of the hunter and the scientist have exceeded all expectations.

Mr. Roosevelt and his son Kermit have killed some 500 specimens of large mammals. The bag includes 17 lions, 11 elephants, 10 buffaloes, 10 black rhinoceroses, 9 white rhinoceroses, 9 hippopotami, 9 giraffes, 3 leopards, 7 chetahs, 3 giant elands, 3 sables, 1 sitatunga and 2 bongos. All of these, Mr. Roosevelt himself explains, were killed in the interest of science, and the specimens will be disposed of accordingly, the greater number going to the Smithsonian Institution. Mr. Roosevelt will retain not more than six trophies for himself.

From the point of importance the most highly prized game may be rated as follows: First, the giant elands, the first complete specimens of which are now being taken from the country; second, the white rhinoceroses; third, the bongos, the first which have been stalked and killed by a white man, and fourth, the sitatunga, a species of antelope. The naturalists have a collection of thousands of birds, comprising several new species, and a long list of the smaller mammals of Africa. The game taken and the collections made constitute a world's record for a similar period of hunting and scientific research in Africa, and the American museums will receive the greatest collection of African fauna in existence.

A CHILD'S MORNING PRAYER

Composed by Robert C. Dilks, aged eleven

NOW I wake and see the light,
I thank God who kept me through the night;
Then I upward look above
And see the angels filled with love.
The angels seem to me
Like stars shining from Calvary
Calvary is a wonderful place
Where Jesus went to save the race.

MR. ROCKEFELLER'S GREATEST GIFT

His Vast Fortune to Be Devoted to the "Rockefeller Foundation," A Great National Philanthropy

"I DON'T mind what people say about me. If the public misunderstand me, simply because they don't know my purpose, I don't believe that it is a part of my duty to find fault or to feel badly over it. Some day they'll know me better, and then they may understand me, and I may even win respect and possibly the love of some who are now hostile in their criticisms. But—I can wait; that is the reason why I don't reply to whatever may be said about me. It would be to no purpose. I can wait."

This was substantially the language with which Mr. John D. Rockefeller, nearly four years ago, while at Compiègne, France, answered a friend who had asked him, in a familiar way, concerning the criticism and abuse that had been leveled at him in the past.

Mr. Rockefeller has well preserved his silence, and only now has his great secret purpose been disclosed to the world. On March 3, in the United States Senate, the Hon. Jacob H. Gallinger, Senator from New Hampshire, arose in his place and introduced a bill by which it is shown that Mr. Rockefeller intends to make such a disposition of his vast wealth as will not only surprise the American people, but will place him in the forefront of public benefactors. It is a bill to enable Mr. Rockefeller to expend his great fortune in national philanthropy. It provides for the incorporation of "The Rockefeller Foundation," the purpose of which is to pension teachers, advance the cause of education, and "promote all the elements of human progress and the well-being of the civilized world." For the accomplishment of this great object Mr. Rockefeller stands ready to bestow practically all of his enormous fortune, which has been variously estimated at from $500,000,000 to $1,000,000,000. We quote from the language of the bill itself:

"The object of the said corporation shall be to promote the well-being and to advance the civilization of the peoples of the United States and its territories and possessions and of foreign lands in the acquisition and dissemination of knowledge; in the prevention and relief of suffering, and in the promotion of the elements of human progress.

"For the promotion of such objects the said corporation shall have power: To establish, maintain and endow, or to aid others, whether individuals, associations or corporations, to establish, maintain and endow institutions and other agencies for carrying on said objects and any of them; to purchase, hold, sell and convey real estate necessary or convenient for the said corporate objects, and to erect, improve, enlarge and equip buildings and other structures necessary or convenient for said objects or any of them, and to acquire, make and furnish all necessary or convenient apparatus and other accessories; to employ and aid others to employ teachers, lecturers, assistants and agents; to donate to any individual, association or corporation engaged in similar work money or property, real or personal, which shall at any time be held by the said corporation hereby constituted, subject to the terms of any gift, grant, bequest or devise by which the said corporation shall have received the same; to collect statistics and information and to publish and distribute books, documents and reports containing the same, and in general to do and perform all things necessary or convenient for the promotion of the object of the corporation."

The incorporators are John D. Rockefeller, John D. Rockefeller, Jr., Fred T. Gates, Starr J. Murphy and Charles O. Heydt, "together with such persons as they may associate with themselves and their successors." The Rockefeller Foundation is to be an incorporated body of the District of Columbia. The members of the corporation may be increased to twenty-five in number. The principal offices are to be located in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Rockefeller's previous public benefactions are second only to those of Mr. Andrew Carnegie, who has given for various philanthropic and educational purposes $162,000,000. Mr. Carnegie explained his liberality during his lifetime, in divesting himself of his fortune, by saying: "The time would yet come when it would be considered a crime for a man to die rich." It is evident that Mr. Rockefeller is heartily of the same opinion. His principal benefactions up to the present time have been these:

General Education Board	$53,000,000
University of Chicago	25,309,000
Rush Medical College	6,000,000
Y. M. C. A.	1,145,000
Miscellaneous	13,350,000
Total	$119,304,000

In introducing the bill Senator Gallinger explained that it had been given to him by Mr. Rockefeller's lawyers, who gave no explanation of its purpose beyond that indicated in the bill itself. "I believe," he added, "the corporation proposed will be made a vehicle by which Mr. Rockefeller will dispose of virtually all of his hundreds of millions before his death, and put large sums in trust to perpetuate the work. His evident intention is to spend money on a scheme of philanthropy more gigantic than ever has been conceived by a human being in the history of the world."

Mr. Rockefeller, who is now at Augusta, Ga., preserves a sphynx-like silence. All he will say is: "Just at this time I do not care to have anything to say. I'll wait until I see what they are going to do up there. However, you may rest assured that is not anything that'll do harm to anybody."

He is still willing to wait and let things take their course. He is confident that the people, by and by, will understand him better. He has chosen as incorporators men who have had experience in handling great sums of money with which he has entrusted them in the past, and who are familiar with the research work necessary to carry out the purposes of the Foundation.

Should he carry out his purpose in spending the greater part of his wealth while he is yet alive, as in endowing the Rockefeller Foundation after his death, he will undoubtedly justify the statement of Senator Gallinger as being the author of "the greatest scheme of philanthropy ever known in human history."

From well-informed sources it is learned that John D. Rockefeller has been planning for the last twenty years how to decide the distribution of his great wealth. Up to 1890 the subject did not so seriously present itself as it did afterward, and it has taken him all the intervening years to mature his great project. During this long period he has framed for himself a philosophy of life which he partly explained years ago in a series of published articles from his pen. He regarded six things as leading factors in the world's civilization, viz.: 1. Progress in developing the means of subsistence, food, shelter, clothing, sanitation, public health, manufactures, etc. 2. Progress in good government and just laws. 3. Progress in literature. 4. Progress in science and philosophy. 5. Progress in art and refinement. 6. Progress in morals and religion. To conserve all these ideals is his principal aim, but he places especial emphasis on the first. He has unique ideas, too, on the "art of giving," and believes the best philanthropy to be that which helps to give people work and to develop new sources of employment.

One of Mr. Rockefeller's mottoes is: "If we can help people to help themselves, we strike at the root of many evils." Another is:

"There is no measure for charity; if the spirit is there, the matter of proportion is lost sight of."

These show the trend of Mr. Rockefeller's mind, and will no doubt be illustrated practically in the work of his great philanthropic Foundation in the coming years.

HAS WON THOUSANDS TO CHRIST

THE INSPIRING STORY OF THE CREMORNE MISSION, WHICH JERRY M'AULEY FOUNDED

Chas. E. Ballou

Robert Fisher

Joseph Waldron

Wm. Wingrove

Mrs. Ballou

EVERY old New Yorker familiar with his city above Twenty-third Street and below Forty-second knew, a quarter of a century ago, of the notorious Cremorne Garden. It was a vicious resort on Thirty-second Street, haunted by the lowest of men and women, and served by no less than seventy-five barmaids.

Jerry McAuley had seen the Water Street Mission put upon a firm foundation. He felt that its work would keep on without him, and he looked around for a new field of labor. Naturally his eyes turned toward the part of the city just then beginning to be called "the Tenderloin." The great theatres were scattered throughout this section. Nearby were the most costly and famous hotels. The latest electrical devices were displayed along and near this part of Broadway until it was named "the Great White Way."

V. T. Jeffrey

Where the quarry is there the vultures are gathered together. Drinking and gambling houses began to multiply in this vicinity. A debauched police force held out its hand for bribes, and saw nothing wrong. Sin flaunted itself brazenly there until the word "tenderloin" became a hissing and a reproach to the whole decent element in New York City.

"There," said Jerry McAuley, "I will found a mission. It is needed there worse than anywhere else in the world."

So, twenty-eight years ago, he bought one of the two houses on Thirty-second Street which had been called "The Cremorne Garden." The proprietor was angry when he found the purpose to which the building was to be devoted, but he could not help himself. He was angrier still when his very name was borrowed, and beside the sign "Cremorne Garden" appeared another one bearing the words "Cremorne Mission." A passageway connected the two buildings.

"We will close that up," said the old proprietor.

"Not so," said Jerry McAuley; "I want all your people to come to my mission."

For two years this devoted laborer in the vineyard toiled in his new undertaking. Then he was called higher, and the work fell into other hands.

For eighteen years the late Mr. Charles E. Ballou and his wife conducted this mission, and it has done a noble work. S. H. Hadley was converted here, and went forth from its doors to his wonderful success in saving souls. Volumes could be filled with the testimony of those who have been led within its consecrated walls from darkness into light.

V. T. Jeffrey, now a devoted pastor, receiving a salary of several thousand dollars, found Christ here. "I was on my way to destruction," he writes, discouraged, desolate, given over to dissipation. But I came to this mission. Mrs. Ballou pleaded and prayed with me, and when I rose from my knees that night I felt a new hope. On that 21st of June, 1885, I was saved." This man has just given a check offering gift of fifty dollars to the mission, and has presented to Mrs. Ballou a fine and expensive portrait of her husband, whose death last April was a hard blow to the cause.

Another poor drunkard, brought up in a godless home, associated always with thieves and reprobates, came here by chance one evening, was touched by the loving appeal of Mr. Ballou, and has become a changed man. This noble Joseph Waldron has now for fourteen years been a faithful Christian, leading many to righteousness.

During six weeks, not long ago, nine husbands and wives, converted in this mission, stood up and announced that, as for them and their households, they would serve the Lord. One poor drunkard, who had completed a long term in prison, dropped in at the mission one evening and found salvation there. He was a pharmacist, and well educated. Strong in his new faith and hope, he obtained employment, joined his long-estranged family, and is now, after sixteen years of upright and consecrated labor, living in a beautiful home, which he owns, surrounded by a promising family and respected by all who know him.

William Wingrove, master of a good trade and brought up in a Christian home, was early carried away by the love of pleasure, fell into evil ways and seemed hopelessly lost.

"When I went into the Cremorne Mission," he writes, "I was wearing newspapers under my clothes to keep me warm. My toes were sticking out of my shoes. My health was broken. I did not want to go in, but a pal made me. My heart melted under the simple testimonies I heard there, and I have never been into a saloon or taken a drink, or used tobacco, from that day to this. God has done it."

The case of Robert Fisher was also a remarkable one. He pawned his child's coat for drink, and had sunk to the lowest depths. One night he wandered into the mission. He had no coat on, and wore an old pair of overalls instead of trousers; but the loving words he heard there went to his heart, and though, as he describes it, he "shook like a leaf on a tree," he knelt before God and asked for mercy, and it was granted him. From that moment he has been a changed man.

The death of Mr. Ballou, one of the noblest of workers, and possessing marvelous power over all classes of men, followed closely upon that of John Noble Stearns, who, during the entire life of the mission, had been president of the board of trustees. Others of the long-time friends and supporters of this most useful institution have laid down their lives also. New ones must come forward to take their places, or else this "lighthouse on a dark and stormy shore," as it has been fitly called, must cease to shine. The regenerated lives of thousands of men and women, and untold blessings of health, peace and uplift, testify to its value. It must go on and increase. The building in which the mission has been housed is about to be torn down. Therefore it needs at once a new home in the Tenderloin. The site, expensive though it must be, is regarded as of even greater importance than the building. Still, for $100,000 an excellent lot can be bought and a commodious building erected. In this a large hall and lodging-rooms for a hundred homeless men must be provided. These lodgings are an invaluable auxiliary of the mission work. They can also be made financially profitable. A building like this would be a noble memorial to such men as Jerry McAuley, John Noble Stearns and Charles E. Ballou. All around the neighborhood are splendid edifices, dedicated to selfishness and sin. The Lord Jesus should have there one place to call his own.

Mrs. Ballou has dedicated herself to the onerous task of supporting and strengthening the mission. Her great heart of faith and love is not easily discouraged, but she needs help. She is backed by a committee, chosen from among the best business men of New York, and every cent contributed to the Cremorne Mission will be expended in the most judicious way. The urgent need of such an institution in exactly that location must be recognized by everybody. It has no adequate endowment. It must have a building. In the name of the Master, it appeals to his followers for the means to maintain its life-saving work. Few equally good causes are more needy, none are more deserving, and the $100,000 needed should be quickly furnished.

ILLUSTRATED RED LINE EDITION PILGRIM'S PROGRESS

WE have on hand a limited number of copies of our superb Illustrated Red Line Edition of Pilgrim's Progress, by John Bunyan, which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD issued as a special De Luxe Edition some time ago, and which is unquestionably one of the finest and most attractive presentations of this supreme masterpiece ever put before the American people.

These books are not shelf-worn, and are guaranteed to be undamaged in any way, but to make room for other publications we now offer them to our readers, at a decided financial sacrifice, for 60 cents per volume.

Pilgrim's Progress is the most beautiful allegory of human life ever written. It warms the heart, elevates the mind, dispels weariness and gloom and exerts its irresistible influence for good over rich and poor alike. An immortal book, and a book of truly immeasurable and imperishable power, this triumphant work appeals, as few books ever have or will, to the most intellectual as well as to the "plain" people; is relished as keenly by the aged as by the young; is a source of good cheer, and a lasting inspiration to men and women in every walk of life.

Though Pilgrim's Progress is a book that should form an important part in the education of every child, and in most homes one that stands next to the Bible, there are still those who have never read its illuminating pages. But there are many more who have worn their treasured copies threadbare with long use. Here, then, is a big opportunity for any of our readers, who will write us at once, to secure at almost half price a volume that appeals to the eye as well as to the mind, that is good to look at as well as to read.

This edition is superb in its pictorial features, containing in all 102 fine illustrations—many of them full pages. The volume is handsomely bound in Red Vellum De Luxe, with an emblematic cover design and lettering in gold—428 pages. The book measures, when open, 9x15 inches, weighs nearly three pounds, and will be sent, all charges prepaid, upon receipt of 60 cents. Our Departed Chief

ONCE again THE CHRISTIAN HERALD comes to its readers in the sombre hue of sorrow. Our beloved leader has gone from us. Louis Klopsch, the owner and editor of this journal and the inspirer of its many noble enterprises, has passed over to the other side.

Our sorrow is yet too keen for us to go into detail concerning the great loss we have suffered. Dr. Klopsch was not only our friend, but the friend of all humanity. Probably no man of this age has done more with his life in rendering devoted service to his fellow-men in the name of the Master. With abounding enthusiasm and a confidence in the Christian people of this land, he surrounded himself with a great army of earnest, consecrated men and women, and their benevolences and good works, under his leadership, have fairly encircled the globe. Both at home and abroad, wherever human suffering existed, or wherever the cause of the Gospel called for a supreme effort, Louis Klopsch's name is known and his influence felt.

He was a worthy and valiant soldier of the Cross, yet a most honorable and generous one, with charity for all and a respect for all who, under whatever name or denomination, were true followers of the same Lord and Master whom he himself served. He stood for a whole Bible and a full and free Gospel. Christ was to him an all-sufficient Saviour, to do whose will was his chief delight. And he did it with a zest that swept all before it and carried multitudes along in the current of his enthusiasm. With voice and pen, and with all the resources at his command, he labored day by day, through all the years. He never thought of sparing himself, for he was on the "King's business."

No one knew better than he the joy that comes of true service—not with the lips alone, but with the heart and the whole life. How his face shone when he would speak to the poor outcasts, or the homeless men and lads at the Bowery Mission—"the place where God makes crooked men straight." And with the thousands of children of the tenements, for whom he had provided a beautiful summer home, he would be the ideal playmate, for, with the keen intuition of childhood, they knew that he carried within his breast a heart that was ever young.

Our friends and readers, who have been companions and fellow-workers with Dr. Klopsch these many years, will miss that sweet comradeship now. He who led them in many a glorious, Christlike enterprise, through fields of suffering and sorrow, will lead them no longer. He who was their counselor and friend has passed from earthly view. But we rejoice that we have the confident assurance, in his Christian life and triumphant end, that we shall meet him again. He has passed beyond the reach of all pain and worry; gone to that land where "the inhabitant shall not say, I am sick," and where "they that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars for ever and ever."

We shall not say farewell to him who has been our dear co-worker and associate. We shall cherish his memory, emulate his noble example of self-sacrifice and work on, encouraged by the hope that some day, when our own earthly career is closed, we shall meet again up yonder.

Dr. Klopsch's Life in Outline

DR. LOUIS KLOPSCH was born in Lubben, near Berlin, Germany, March 26, 1852, the son of Dr. Osmar Klopsch, a physician. His parents brought him to this country when he was two years old; so, while retaining a strong affection for the people and land of his birth, he was first of all an American in patriotism, education and feeling. He was educated in the public schools and then entered business life. He became identified with the syndicate and publishing business, and in 1877 became the owner of the Hotel Reporter of New York, retaining control of that paper until 1890. He was a close friend of the great preacher, Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, and published his sermons all over the world.

In 1890, after returning from a trip to Palestine, he purchased THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of New York. He gradually enlarged the character and scope of the publication and engaged Dr. Talmage on the editorial staff.

Dr. Klopsch was ready to help the suffering and needy of every land. Through his paper he has raised over $4,000,000 for famine and flood sufferers here and abroad, for the support and education of thousands of famine orphans in India, Japan and China, who had been left in the care of the missionaries, and for other benevolent purposes. In 2, during the terrible famine in Russia, he secured a cargo of foodstuffs and chartered the steamship to carry the supplies to the famine-stricken districts. Dr. Klopsch and Dr. Talmage went personally to the field and oversaw the distribution of this good-will offering from the American people. The supplies saved the lives of thousands of peasants in sixteen different provinces. The Russian Emperor thanked him for his efforts.

In 1892 he sent relief to the massacre survivors in Armenia. He had as co-workers in his relief efforts practically every Christian missionary in that country. In 1897 President McKinley appointed him a member of the Government Commission for the relief of the starving Cuban reconcentrados. He went to Cuba, secured the use of trains, and soon had an abundance of clothing and food on the way to the centres of suffering.

Twice he went to India to carry on relief work—the first time in 1897 and again in 1900. Two steamers were chartered by the United States Government, and the cargo was furnished by the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Dr. Klopsch spent much time in the famine-stricken and fever-infested districts, directing relief operations, in co-operation with the missionaries and officials. In appreciation of this perilous work King Edward later gave him the gold Kaiser-I-Hind medal, Dr. Klopsch being the only American who ever received such an honor. During the first famine in India, he raised $400,000 for the sufferers and during the second he raised about $700,000 in money and secured a cargo of corn. On his return he guaranteed the support of 5,000 India orphans for the period of five years.

In 1891 he raised $80,000 for the starving people of Shensi province, China. In 1903 he raised a fund for the famine sufferers in Sweden and Finland, and went personally to look after the distribution of supplies. In 1906 he raised $250,000 to relieve the famine-stricken districts of northern Japan. As a token of gratitude the Japanese government presented him with the decoration of the Rising Sun.

During the recent floods in northern Mexico he was active in securing supplies of blankets for the homeless people of Monterey and its vicinity.

In 1907 he raised $300,000 for the famine sufferers in China, sending also a shipload of flour. After the great earthquake which devastated Calabria and destroyed Messina, Italy, with the co-operation of Queen Helena he expended $1,000 a day for several months, supplying bread and milk and clothing for the widowed mothers, orphans and children.

Here in our own land he was personally interested in numerous home missions, and gave the strong support of his paper to the work of Christian schools and colleges. Good causes, regardless of denominational connection, always had in him a sincere friend. He was the President of the famous Bowery Mission. He built it up from a small rescue work into one of the largest and most efficient missions in the country.

Dr. Klopsch had a strong love of children and he established THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, at Nyack, N. Y., for the poor children of New York City. It was started at first in a small way, but Dr. Klopsch interested his readers until at last one of the most extensive and best fitted summer settlements in the country has been built up, at which 3,000 waifs are cared for during the season. He used to say that his happiest hours were those he spent at this, his favorite charity.

In 1886 he married Miss May Merritt, daughter of the Rev. Stephen Merritt. The union was blessed with four children, three sons and a daughter.

Dr. Klopsch had been troubled with a stomach affection for several years. Lately, it assumed an acute form, and he was removed from his residence to the German Hospital, New York City, for the purpose of having an operation performed. This was done, and it was hoped that recovery would follow; but complications set in, and on Sunday, March 6, the patient began to sink. He passed away at 1 A.M. on Monday, March 7, surrounded by his family.

He was doing so much, and he had so much yet to do, that his taking away seems to us as a great mystery, the solving of which we must leave to God's good time. He had been doing the work of a thousand lives in the minds he had quickened, the hearts he had purified, the souls he had led into the light, the pains he had eased, the sorrows he had alleviated, and the lives he had saved, and he was ready for his coronation. The Master has taken him into a larger realm of truth and a broader field of love. He is gone, and yet he will remain with us. Memory will mark the print of every one of his footsteps, blossoming with the flowers of virtue and of piety; it will echo his every word of kindness and cherish his every act of tenderness and of love.

Thousands who have gone up from every part of the green earth have already gathered about him, to bless him for what he did for them in Jesus' name. We who remain shall claim him in memory, we shall see him by the eye of faith till we touch his hands again and enjoy his companionship forever.

Deadly Avalanche in Idaho

SNOW-SLIDES in the Cœur d'Alene Mountains buried Mace and Burke, and other mining towns of North Idaho under thousands of tons f snow and rocks and destroyed twenty precious ives. Twenty-two years ago there was a similar isaster, in which Burke was destroyed and sixty eople killed. Besides the nineteen persons lost at lace and Burke, three died in the disaster which estroyed the camp of the Carbonite Hill Mining ompany at Mullan, Idaho, and two perished at orsey. The main body of the avalanche started rom the top of Custer Mountain. It buried Mace nd filled the canyon to a depth of forty-five feet. t came within 120 feet of the boarding house of the tandard Mine, where 300 miners were sleeping. he snow-slide buried Burke fifty feet under the now and filled the canyon for 3,000 feet. More ould have been killed at Burke had not Seaman . Rowe, the foreman of the Hecla Mine, sent a ourier to warn the people. The most heroic work f rescue is recorded which would be expected in hat region of hardy and real heroic men. Mrs. eorge Hooper, who lived on the dge of Mace, and who was uried 13 feet under the snow for wo hours, was extricated and aved. One of the snow-slides as started by the concussion aused by a shout of joy by successful rescuers. The old residents of the region have been ounding daily warnings to these ining towns on account of the ecord depth of the snow. But he people, having had freedom rom these avalanches for so any winters, did not listen to he warnings or take any preaution for their safety. The eople of our country are grieved t the score of persons who met he untimely death and feel the eepest sympathy for the members of the stricken families that urvive, but it must not be forotten that nature has a severe s well as a mild side; that there snow on the mountain, and hat the snow is likely to rush own the sides and destroy that hich is in its path, and that here is necessity for wisdom, aution and a provision against he dangers that threaten in the atural and spiritual world. The nowstorms of winter on the ountains, as well as the zephyrs f spring, are a part of the ivine Providence, as suggested by the words of he Psalmist:

Fire and hail; snow and vapor; stormy wind fulfilling his word. s. 148: 8.)

lectricity from the Sun

We are in the midst of the electrical age. The reat problem is the manufacture of electricity at a rice cheap enough to justify its universal use. It is ossible that this problem is on the way to a solution a new invention which proposes to capture the eat of the sun and make it generate electricity. he sun's rays have been used heretofore, in a small ay, to produce steam in a boiler and run an engine, s in Ericsson's and similar motors. Mr. George S. ove, of Somerville, Mass., has invented a device ith which he proposes to use the sun's heat in runing a new electrical generator. Such generators are sually run with the aid of heat from gas flames. he machine is thus described in an article in Modrn Electrics:

The apparatus consists of a little metallic frame, which looks e an exaggerated window. The frame contains a number of ines of violet glass, behind which are set, through an asphaltmpound backing, many little metal plugs. One end of these ugs is always exposed to the sunlight, while the other end is ol and sheltered. The invisible rays of the solar spectrum d the invisible ultra-violet rays, after passing through the olet glass, set up a reaction in the peculiar metal alloy used, hich produces a continual flow of electrical current into storge batteries.

It is not too much to say that Mr. Cove has revolutionized r conceptions of power generation. Already we can picture e liner of the future propelled by invisible current, stored in tteries by the Sun Electric Generator on a far-away desert, d fed into the hold of a vessel in much the same manner as e cartridge belt is fed into a machine gun. The railroad ain of to-morrow, instead of taking on coal and water, will lug" into the power-house at the terminal station and pump it enough electricity to make the trip from New York to icago.

Time and experiment will determine how much of success Mr. Cove's invention is. If it shall prove anything like the success he promises, it will go a long way toward furnishing light, heat and power at such an economical price as will put them within the reach of the common people everyhere. If the sun, which furnishes light, warmth, heat and life for plant, animal and man, shall now be kind enough to generate electrical motor power for practical use, our age will have an additional reason for joining Moses in his farewell song of blessing, in which he records man's indebtedness to the benevolent services of the sun in these words:

And of Joseph he said, Blessed of the Lord be his land, for the precious things of heaven, for the dew, and for the deep that coucheth beneath, and for the precious fruits brought forth by the sun. (Deut. 33:13, 14.)

A Miser's Money

Mrs. J. W. Madden, a miser, recently died at Nashville, Tenn. Mr. E. Halley, the nearest relative, when the funeral services were over, began a search for the money which he was sure his foster-mother had concealed somewhere about the premises. She did not believe in banks, and had concealed money under the carpets, inside of picture frames, and in every other conceivable secret place. By a careful search, $184,000 were found hidden about the house. She was so afraid that some one would get a dollar of her money that she never left her home for seventeen years. Could any life be much more fully misspent than this? What comfort she could have brought to herself and her friends with the interest on her fortune! And yet she preferred to be poor in the midst of her gold, and starve her soul literally to death, in the midst of opportunities for spiritual abundance. How many barrels of flour and tons of coal she could have given to the widows, and how many suits of clothing and pairs of shoes she could have supplied to the orphans! How much she could have done for the church, and for the various benevolences of the church! She loved money for the money's sake, and there was no room left in the withered soul for anything else. She was the expression of discontent; she was a miser, and hence miserable, as the word indicates. The preacher has thus described her, and those who belong to her class:

He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver: nor he that loveth abundance with increase: this is also vanity. (Eccles. 5:10.)

Wallace, Idaho, Where an Avalanche Destroyed Many Lives

Noted Gambler Gone

Patrick F. Sheedy, at one time perhaps the most noted gambler in the world, died at his residence in New York City recently. He made a tour of the world with John L. Sullivan, which ended in Boston, when Sullivan was presented with a diamond-studded belt worth $10,000. He parted company with the prize-fighter for good when Sullivan celebrated the event by getting drunk. Almost thirty years ago Sheedy gave up his gambling with cards, and having an æsthetic temperament devoted much of his time to securing and enjoying masterpieces of fine art. He had collected a beautiful fine-art gallery in his home, and in the midst of these surroundings, after an illness of two years, he passed away. A little time before his death, in an interview with a newspaper reporter, he dwelt upon the sin and failure of a gambler's life, and expressed his deepest regret for having had any relationship with that kind of vice. The disposition to get something for nothing, by one device or another, is a sin so fascinating and dangerous as to require the most careful human caution and divine help. The gambling instinct is as old as the wickedness of the human heart, and under the very shadow of the cross the Roman soldiers gambled for the Saviour's seamless robe.

They said therefore among themselves, Let us not rend it, but cast lots for it, whose it shall be: that the Scripture might be fulfilled, which saith, They parted my raiment among them, and for my vesture they did cast lots. These things therefore the soldiers did. (John 19:24.)

Cure for Pneumonia

Dr. Henry A. Craig, assistant physician at the Sailors' Snug Harbor Hospital, New Brighton, New York, in the Medical Record gives an account of a marvelous cure for pneumonia, which promises to be one of the greatest physical blessings of modern times. Six pneumonia patients, all old persons, from sixty-six to eighty-seven years of age, and all damaged by alcohol, were inoculated with the vaccine, and there was a recovery in every instance. Millions of germs obtained from the blood, and from the sputum of infected ones, were made into a vaccine, the number of pneumococci being fifty millions in a cubic centimetre. They were killed by keeping them in a hot sterilizer for three-quarters of an hour, at a temperature of from 55 to 60 degrees centigrade. The patients were vaccinated with from twenty to thirty million of the bacteria at one time, the treatment being repeated every two days, until the patients were on the road to recovery. Before this discovery was made, sixty-six per cent. of those afflicted with pneumonia died. Two reasons for the great mortality were that the hospital received only old people and persons with an alcoholic history. What a beauty and glory it is to live in this age of progress, when science almost every day reveals some new remedy for the body and charity some new home for the soul! It is the mind of Jesus that suggests these cures; it is his heart that provides the asylums for the diseased and suffering; it is his love that cures all heartaches and ills and evils, and gives life. He continues the ministry of health and salvation, which he began in his earthly life.

And he healed many that were sick of divers diseases, and cast out many devils. (Mark 1:34.)

Bees Among the Flowers

Nature has conspired to make Switzerland beautiful as well as sublime. In the spring and summer there is an infinite variety of wild flowers of every hue and fragrance, growing on the hillsides and lower mountain ranges and in the lovely valleys between. The Swiss are willing that their people and the tourists shall enjoy the exquisite beauty of their wild flowers; but they are thrifty enough to see to it that these flowers also bring to them practical profit, and they have provided vast colonies of bees for their beds of bloom. From the report of the Swiss Society of Agriculturists we learn that there are two hundred and fifty thousand hives of bees in their country, each of which produces forty pounds of honey during the season, or a total of ten million pounds a year. As the price of honey last year was 25 cents a pound, the harvest of the bees amounted to $2,500,000. Most of this sum is clear profit for the farmer, as nature furnishes the material and the bees most of the labor. In the description of the land God promised to the children of Israel there is repeated reference to the grass for the cows, and flowers for the bees, in the expression "flowing with milk and honey." As we think of the dairy products and the bee culture of Switzerland, the old description of Canaan can be appropriately given to it:

A land that floweth with milk and honey. (Deut. 11:9)

Secretary Meyer

President Obaldia

Viscount Gladstone

Baron Dairoka Kikuchi

OF William E. Gladstone's sons only one, Herbert Gladstone, followed in his father's footsteps and went into political life. Another became a clergyman of the Church of England. He is now rector of the church at Barrowby, in Lincolnshire. Herbert Gladstone, who was recently made the first Governor-General of the Union of South Africa, has just been raised to the peerage by King Edward, with the title of Viscount.

The new Viscount Gladstone was born in 1854, and passed through the experiences that usually fall to the lot of a young Englishman of good position. He went to Eton College and then to Oxford University. He was greatly interested in historical subjects, and was history lecturer in Keble College from 1877 to 1880. Then he decided to go into political life. He contested Middlesex County in 1880, and became private secretary to his father the same year. In 1881 he became a Lord of the Treasury and held the position for four years; then he became Financial Secretary of the War Office. In 1892 he became Secretary of the Home Office, holding this responsible post for two years, and gaining much valuable experience. From the Home Office he stepped over to that of First Commissioner of Works for a year.

In 1901 he married Miss Dorothy Paget, the youngest daughter of Sir Richard Paget, Baronet.

President Obaldia of Panama, to the regret of his people, passed away the last of February, and has been succeeded by Dr. C. A. Mendoza. The funeral of Obaldia took place March 2, and a detachment of American marines were in the guard of honor. President Mendoza delivered the funeral oration. He paid a great tribute to the memory of the dead statesman and said he wished to follow in his foot steps.

One of America's distinguished guests is Baro Dairoka Kikuchi, who, on account of his interest i education, is known as the "President Eliot of Ja pan." He is lecturing here on the "New Japan," and his first lecture in Carnegie Hall, New York was before a cultured and greatly interested audience.

"CHILDREN'S NIGHT" AT METROPOLITAN TEMPLE

ONE of the most unique services in the progressive work of the Metropolitan Temple, or, for that matter, in the church life of New York City, is what is known as "Children's Night" — a meeting held every Thursday evening for children. Children of all ages, different creeds and many nationalities mingle together at these services, which are directed along patriotic, educational and religious lines. A great screen hangs over the chancel, on which stereopticon views and moving pictures are displayed—each view intended to point a moral, adorn a tale, illustrate a principle, or emphasize duty to home and God and country.

About fifteen minutes are devoted each evening to a study of the Bible as pictured on the canvas, thus making the Bible stories comprehensive to the child mind. Wonderful! How these pictures enchant; how they demand the attention of all, regardless of their church affiliation—or lack of affiliation! Then, to hear the children sing is worth a trip across the city. Such outbursts of patriotic song are rarel heard anywhere! Indeed, one can scarcely imagine the effect of a thousan children's voices united in "America," "The Star-Spangled Banner," "Colum bia, the Gem of the Ocean," varied at times with on of the old standard hymns such as "Nearer, My God to Thee," or sweetened int that tender song which ha moved the hearts of million of people, "Home, Swee Home."

The Great Children's Gathering in the Metropolitan Temple

Frequently addresses ar delivered to the children, bu never of a sectarian or dog matic character. A stran ger, hearing the pastor, th Rev. John Wesley Hill, talk ing to the children, woul listen to words that cloth great practical truths an emphasize lessons in religio deeper than creed, moralit and devotion stronger tha mere profession.

Such a work as this i fundamental to the succes of Christianity, in fact, o Americanism, in New York If the children of to-day ar not cared for, the to-morrow of our country will be bi with peril.

WHAT FORMER "HOME HERALD" READERS SAY OF "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD"

Farmer's Opinion

Dear Sirs: I have been a subscriber to the Home Herald since it was first published, I believe, and was pleased with it, but the past year there was so much fine print that I found it difficult to read it all, as I am an old man of eighty-one years. I have received five copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and find it to be a fine, clear type, and I think it is in every respect superior to the Home Herald.

JOSEPH R. SMITH.

Odessa, Ontario, Canada.

More than Pleased with the Change

Dear Sirs: I wish to continue my membership with you, since you have bought out the Home Herald. I have received three copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and like it exceedingly well, if not better than the Home Herald. Enclosed find two dollars and sixty-five cents ($2.65), for which please send me your second offer of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Cosmopolitan and McClure's Magazine.

FRED W. ISRAEL.

Worcester, Mass.

Pleased Beyond Measure

Dear Dr. Klopsch: When I first read the article published in the Home Herald of the consolidation with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD I thought it too good to be true. It was my desire to tell you so, but I felt that was pushing my gratefulness too far. Since your invitation, I most freely state that I am pleased beyond measure and am rejoicing that I have two more years' subscription yet paid for. May the choicest of blessings be added to you.

Louisville, Ky. W. G. CISSELL.

Likes the "Feast of Good Things"

Mr. Editor: I am glad the Hom Herald has passed to one who can an does provide "a feast of fat things, with no reason for the common cry o "soaring prices." My subscriptio ends in March. Please send TH CHRISTIAN HERALD and McClure's also "Dreamland" and "Daughters o Dorcas." If McClure's volume begin with January, I would like to have th numbers that would make a complet volume, if it is not asking too much

A TRIP UP THE WHITE NILE

Quaint Houses of the Shulla Tribesmen

A Shulla Warrior

A Village Group Along the Upper Nile

By EARL ELDER, Assiut College, Egypt

DURING the past year I took an extended trip up the White Nile, going as far as 2,500 miles from the mouth. This is the country which Ex-President Roosevelt will shortly visit. He will also come to Assiut and will be conducted through Egypt by Professor McClenahan, president of Assiut College.

When one journeys northward from Uganda the first uncivilized tribes to be seen are those of the Upper Nile. In spite of the Arab influence which has permeated the Soudan, these Niloid people still retain their separate customs and religions. For four or five hundred miles up the White Nile the population is Arabic, owing to the dissemination of that people under the Khalifa before Kitchener reconquered the Soudan. The Arabs have introduced a more complex, if not a more enlightened, form of life with their Moslem religion. But the native tribes of the Upper Nile country are in most respects similar to the people of Central Africa. Each tribe has its own peculiar mark, which is cut upon the forehead. The Shulla, for example, has a series of dotted scars, while the Dinka has a number of gashes. Each tribe has a religion which deals with gods and demi-gods. The crocodile is considered a sacred animal by many of them. Like the people of Central Africa, they are very superstitious and believe in charms and fetiches. Without a written language, they have handed down from generation to generation a wealth of folklore and tradition.

The Shulla is one of the large tribes, and a typical one for description. Their costume is very simple. In remote regions, where a white man is rarely seen, no clothing is worn. But in more frequented regions the men knot a single cloth over the shoulder and the women attire themselves in a couple of sheep skins. The scanty costumes and the excessive heat necessitate the anointing of the body with a greasy mixture, which has a very unpleasant odor. Sometimes they sprinkle themselves with a red powder which resembles brickdust. As among all primitive people, the men are given to display in the adornment of their persons. The heads of the women are usually shaved, but the greatest pride of a warrior is in his hair. Often they bleach the hair with ashes until it assumes a hue of fiery red. Oftener they shave a part of the head and then mat the rest of the hair in fantastic shapes. Sometimes it has the appearance of a coxcomb, or the helmet of a Roman centurion, or an immense butterfly. They often add a ghastly look to their faces by covering them with ashes. The most sacred trinket which the native possesses is the white ivory ring worn on the upper arm. Around their waists they often wear a number of loops of ostrich-shell beads. The women carry about huge bracelets and anklets of silver in addition to necklaces and other ornaments.

The weapons of the Shullas are two: a club and a spear. In battle they carry a shield made from the hide of the crocodile or hippopotamus. On rare occasions, inter-tribal war occurs; but more often trouble is confined to villages of the same tribe. To them the tribe means little, the village everything. When there is enmity between villages, it often terminates in a destructive conflict and the burning of the conquered village. The Soudanese government exercises only a restraining influence over the people by their military posts.

Life among the Shullas is very simple. Devoid of ambition, their few wants are easily supplied. Hunting and fishing furnish some of the necessaries of life, and these are supplemented by the small fields of corn which are cared for by the women. Before the coming of the white man, the natives used to hunt the hippopotamus in a crude fashion, attacking it with spears and harassing it until it died of exhaustion. Now the hippopotami are much fewer in number and harder to approach. When they become aware of the presence of man they remain hidden under the water, showing their noses on the surface at prolonged intervals. Whenever some African hunter kills a hippo it is the signal for a festival among the natives.

The thousands of miles of plain give an excellent opportunity for stock raising, and cattle are raised in abundance. The care of the herds is left to the small boys. Cattle are never killed or used as beasts of burden. Their only value is to furnish milk and to be used as a medium of exchange in purchasing a wife. A good wife can be gotten with four or five cows. As this is no small fortune, there is little wonder that the young men don't marry early in life. A rich father with many sons often prefers to add another wife to his already large household rather than buy a wife for his unmarried son. The father of a number of girls does not curse his fate, as most Oriental fathers would; but, on the other hand, he is an object of envy, for he possesses a great resource in his salable property. The women enjoy a position far in advance of their sisters of the Levant and Orient. There is no marrying of young girls, and the place of woman is not a secluded one. A man treats his wife as he would his neighbor. If he beats her, she may crush his skull with a war-club some night while he is asleep. They can assert their rights, if necessary.

The Shulla houses are very unpretentious, consisting of a circular mud wall, surmounted by a conical thatched roof; but the interiors of these dwellings are kept scrupulously clean. They lack the filth and unpleasant odors of the houses of the "Near East." The houses belonging to a "jago"—an old man—and his sons are built around an open space. In this space the cattle are kept and protected at night from wild animals.

All of the traveling which the natives do is done on foot. They don't possess donkeys, and camels cannot live on the Upper Nile. When a man wishes to cross a river he either does it in a canoe, hollowed from a tree trunk, or on a peculiar raft of ambatch. The latter is much more common. Ambatch is almost three times as light as cork. When the river has been crossed, the traveler picks up the canoe and carries it to his village.

The people are very hospitable and polite. When a Shulla greets another member of the human race he says, "Yi bi jal dwong," or "Yi kal Jouk." These salutations mean "You are a big man" and "You bring God with you." But these people have acquired many wicked and immoral habits, even in their low state of civilization. Much of their time is given to the drinking of marissa, a very injurious drink. Besides that, their practices have brought on many physical afflictions.

THE LONG FIGHT AGAINST TUBERCULOSIS

EVERY week brings fresh evidence that the public is thoroughly aroused over the awful ravages of the white plague." The latest of the more significant manifestations of this awakening is the erection of four sanitary apartment houses on East Seventy-seventh Street, in New York City, by Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt. They are intended for the accommodation of families in which there is at least one tuberculous member. Abundant light and air are furnished, and the breezes from the East River blow fresh upon them. They are designed by Henry Atterbury Smith, and are under the direct supervision of Dr. Henry L. Shively, who is in charge of the tuberculosis clinic of the New York Presbyterian Hospital.

The income from these buildings, which should be between $50,000 and $60,000, will be devoted by their generous donor to the assistance of other families who are afflicted with the disease. Dr. Shively is reported as saying: "This is the ideal way to care for white plague sufferers. When sanitarium patients return to their homes, relapse is almost inevitable. Hence this new plan of bringing sanitarium conditions to the patients."

Says the Artist Was Inspired

Dear Dr. Klopsch: The "Dreamland" calendar and "Daughters of Dorcas" are a delight. The pictures will be a daily cheer. "Dreamland" certainly is a rare production. The artist must have been inspired. It was another inspiration when it occurred to you to put it where so many could enjoy it. Your paper is a strength and help. Thanks for all!

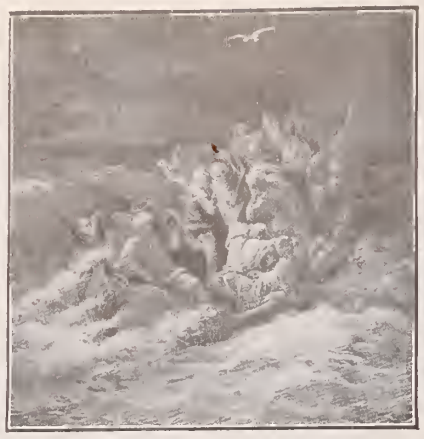
THE SAYINGS AND DOINGS OF JESUS

Calling of Matthew



Stilling the Tempest

Christ and the Fishermen

Christ Healing the Sick

JESUS lived the simple life in Nazareth until he was thirty years of age; then he came forth as a teacher. It was the accustomed age for all Jewish teachers to begin their work. He was probably attired like them. We are told that the rabbis (teachers) laid it down as a rule that "the learned ought to be most careful in their manner of dress, and that it was a disgrace if a scholar walked abroad with clouted shoes, and that dirty clothes deserved death," because the profession of teaching had been dishonored. The rabbis wore a distinctive dress, and undoubtedly Jesus was attired like them. On the head the sudar was worn, a handkerchief twisted into a sort of turban, or the mcaphoreth, a large handkerchief which covered the head and hung down over the shoulders.

The Appearance of Jesus

The kittunah was the inner garment (not underclothing), which in case of a rabbi descended to the feet.

At the waist the kittunah was confined by a girdle, about six inches wide and two yards or more long. John the Baptist wore a leathern girdle. Girdles were made of cloth, cord or leather.

Over the kittunah was worn the tallith, as an outer garment. It was a piece of cloth about two yards square. It was white, with a border, or "ribband of blue" (Num. 15:38), with four long white cords and one of blue, knotted together at each corner. These were the "fringes," one of which the woman touched on the tallith worn by Jesus.

A larger form of the tallith is called a robe or mantle. (We are indebted to Dr. Edersheim in the Life and Times of the Messiah for these particulars concerning Jesus' clothing.)

*The Quarterly Review by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts, for March 27, 1910. GOLDEN TEXT: "Jesus went about Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of sickness and all manner of disease among the people." Matt. 4:23.

Jesus' first journey as a teacher was from Nazareth to Bethabara, that he might be baptized of John. He probably crossed the River Jordan at a point about twenty miles east of Nazareth and passed through Decapolis and Perea, along the east bank of the Jordan. After his baptism he went into the wilderness of Judah, a region lying between Jerusalem and the Dead Sea; there he was tempted of the devil. After his temptation he returned to Bethabara and was proclaimed by John as the Saviour of the world. He continued his journey along the eastern side of the Jordan, which he crossed, and came to Cana, where he wrought his first miracle, that of turning water into wine. He then went on to Capernaum, where he remained a few days (John 2:12). His next journey was to Jerusalem to attend the first Passover of his ministry, when he passed along the western side of the Jordan River, through Jericho. The next covers the return from Jerusalem to Capernaum.

The Journeys of Jesus

The next journey of Jesus was from Cana to Nazareth, where he tried to preach the initial sermon of his ministry, but was rejected (Luke 4:16-31). He then went on to Capernaum, which for more than a year became the base of his operations. He first went out through the eastern part of Galilee, near the Sea of Galilee, teaching and healing. It was then he first healed a leper, and afterward the paralytic, let down through the roof.

He made a journey to Jerusalem to attend the Passover, the second in his ministry, and healed a cripple at the pool of Bethesda.

The next journey of Jesus was from Capernaum to the Mount of Beatitudes, where he preached his Sermon on the Mount and ordained his twelve apostles. He returned to Capernaum, and afterward started out on a tour of teaching through southern Galilee.

There was John the Baptist, who was his forerunner, and who prepared the hearts and understandings of men to receive him as the "Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world." John (who after became the beloved disciple) and Andrew were his first followers. John and Andrew were the first to listen to his teachings. James the brother of John, and Peter, the brother of Andrew, were the next to become his friends and followers, then Philip and Nathanael (John, chap. 1).

The Friends of Jesus

Nicodemus, who timidly first came to him by night, afterward became his lifelong friend, and his friend in death.

The woman of Samaria whom he met at the well became an evangel to lead her townspeople to listen to the teaching of Jesus.

When Jesus returned to Galilee, the Galileans became his friends because they had seen and heard all that he did in Jerusalem at the Passover.

The nobleman in Capernaum became the friend of Jesus (his whole household also), because Jesus recovered his son from sickness.

The demoniac whom Jesus delivered from the devil in the synagogue in Capernaum was ever afterward a friend of Jesus. And Peter's wife's mother, whom he cured of the fever, she too was a friend, and also every one of the great throng whom Jesus had healed in Capernaum. What a friend did that man become whom Jesus had cured of the leprosy! He could not contain himself for joy, but told all he met what Jesus had done for him. And there was Matthew the publican, who became one of Jesus' closest friends.

And the man let down through the roof, when he had been healed by Jesus, was he not the friend of Jesus? And when he reached his home, himself carrying the bed on which he had been borne by four, his wife and children became the friends of Jesus.

When he was baptized he said, " becometh us to fulfil all righteousnes
When he was tempted he said, "M shall not live by bread alone, but every word that procee eth out of the mouth
God." "Thou shalt wo ship the Lord thy Go and him only shalt th serve."

The Words of Jesus

When he was trying to comfort a uplift men, he said, "Blessed are t poor in spirit. Blessed are they th mourn. Blessed are the meek. Bles ed are they that hunger and thir after righteousness. Blessed are t pure in heart. Blessed are the peac makers. Blessed are the persecute Blessed are the merciful."

When he would teach men to li peaceably, he said, "Love your enemi and pray for them that despiteful use you."

When he would teach men to pra he said, "Pray to thy Father who is secret." "Use not vain repetitions
"After this manner pray ye, O Father who art in heaven," etc. Wh he would teach men how to rega riches he said, "Lay up for yourselv treasures in heaven, where thieves not break through and steal." Wh he would teach men what brotherho means he said, "Whatsoever ye wou that men should do to you, do ye eve so to them."

When he would teach men how build characters, he said, "Every o that heareth these words of mine a doeth them shall be likened unto a wi man that built his house upon a rock
When he would increase the faith men he said, "Go thy way; as th hast believed, so be it done unto thee
To men of little faith he said, "W are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?"

When he helped the sick and sinf man he said, "Son, be of good chee thy sins are forgiven."

When he wanted to proclaim himse a Saviour he said, "I came not to ca the righteous, but sinners."

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH

Seeing Under the Surface

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

PROBABLY it is given to few of us to see beneath the surface. The tramp who comes to the back door, in ragged clothes, with unkempt hair and grim visage, may be at heart an honest man out of work and at odds with life, who would be glad to change his present mode of makeshift living for something better if he could. Nine-tenths of us regard him with suspicion, give him something to eat on the doorstep, and breathe a sigh of relief when he is beyond the premises. The dogs are unfriendly to such a wayfarer, and the children run from his presence. Sometimes it happens that a person belonging to the other tenth, the tenth that is compassionate and can see possibilities and extenuating circumstances even in a fellow-pilgrim who is tattered and dirty, reaches a helping hand to the tramp. The man is invited into the house, given a seat at the table, and served with a meal as if he were a guest. Not always does he repay such treatment with gratitude; for he, too, has had his training in envy and suspicion. Sometimes his better nature is awakened and he gives proof of rectitude, of powers that have lain dormant, and of ability to become a useful member of society. We are far too ready to estimate the worth of people either by their apparent respectability, or by the texture of their clothes, than by any other gauge of merit.

Take, for example, the agent who comes to the door with wares to sell. Whether he is independent vender is canvassing for subscriptions, selling books, soap or shoestrings, there is no reason for behaving as though the business call were an intrusion. Sometimes the coming of the book-agent, or of the pheasant-faced little woman who sells perfumes, flavors and silver polish, is a convenience to the housekeeper and a welcome break in the monotony of the morning. Although one may not invariably wish to be a purchaser, one may give such a visitor the uplift of sympathy.

Not long ago a brave-hearted little lady, forced in middle life to earn her own living and having no previous training, undertook the work of canvassing for a firm which had a national reputation. Talking with one of her customers she said, "I am beginning to know front doors. Some of them smile at me as I go up the steps and ring the bell, others frown. Some of the women I meet look at me with contempt and aversion, and make me wonder if I ever had a home and people like theirs. Others give me a cordial welcome and treat me as if I had a right to be in the world, notwithstanding the fact that I am a traveling saleswoman."

Friends, let us look beneath the surface. Let us not forget that it is perfectly wonderful to note the miracles that are accomplished by soap and water, by a clean collar, a warm coat and something to eat. The leader of a mission had one evening played a fine organ himself and led the singing for the crowd who came to the meeting. After the benediction, a man out at the elbows and bearing marks of dissipation, stepped up to him and said, "You don't know how to play that organ." "Do you?" inquired the leader. "Try me," was the reply. He sat down at the keyboard, and presently the organ pipes responded to the touch of a master hand with thrilling melody. The leader could see beneath the surface. Here was a man worth saving, and here in his love of music and his knowledge the way was indicated. "I need your help," the leader said, "and you must give it to me." The man had a battle to fight, and he had more than one defeat, but a band of brothers was soon at his side and he was redeemed from sin and its dominion, and is to-day helping in the work of saving others.

A Move in the Right Direction

A pastor in Newark, N. J., quietly passed the word around among his congregation that he would regard it as a personal favor should the women who came to church remove their hats during the service. Nothing was said openly, but as the pastor is very popular and a man accustomed to have his own way, the sisterhood decided to do as he asked. The result was that, when the next Sunday morning dawned bright and clear, as many as seven hundred female heads were freed from the present umbrageous and exaggerated headgear, waving with feathers and loaded with flowers.

We have long urged the adoption of a modest and diminutive hat to be worn by women in church on Sunday. In every other public place women are now requested to remove their hats. Why should the only place in which crowds assemble for worship and meditation be an exception? Nothing is more distracting than a bonnet or hat in front of one, effectually hiding the preacher and obscuring the area of vision. To remove a hat during service, if only every one would adopt the fashion, would be to make the hour more impressive and profitable. This is from the point of view of the pew.

A BAZAR IN CAIRO

THE other day a young girl showed a friend a curious veil shot through and through with gleams of gold and silver, a wonderful bit of tinsel-work. "Where did you get it?" was asked. "My father bought it in Cairo," she replied. Cairo attracts people of every land, and such a shop as the picture shows, quaint and Oriental, is usually the meeting-place of eager buyers whom the merchants cheat if they can, but serve with exceeding politeness and an air of the utmost leisure.

A Dividing Line

WE were taught when we studied geography to define the equator as an imaginary line encircling the surface of the globe, midway between the North and South Poles. Something very like an imaginary equatorial line divides one sex from the other. There are those who fancy that this dividing line is indicated in temperament or disposition, in sinew and muscle. A few benighted people still fancy that there is sex in brain, and that the intellectual powers of men and women are necessarily different in degree. Such notions are based on a fallacy. Given equal opportunities, happy environment and similar training, men and women confront life on equal terms. With no desire to be frivolous, one observer has reached the conclusion that the equatorial line, if it exist, is to be found in the region of the top drawer. A man may possibly possess a top drawer, but if he does he reserves it for neckties and whatever else is appropriate in that connection. A boy's pocket, up to the time he is twelve, has a faint resemblance to the top drawer of the ordinary woman. After twelve, this resemblance ceases, and when a boy becomes a man, and walks about in a suit equipped with fourteen pockets or thereabouts, he manages to keep most of them in very decent order. A woman, having no pockets, and being reduced to the necessity of tucking her handkerchief into a belt or sleeve and carrying her purse in a hand-bag, has really no repository where she may conveniently store the multiform and manifold little things that belong to her daily life. The word "truck" aptly describes many of these, yet they may at some time be useful, they are too good to throw away, they cannot be utilized as gifts, and they accumulate in the top drawer.

Ribbons, hairpins, toilet soap, talcum powder, safety-pins, common pins, hooks and eyes, tape, elastic bands, photographs, boxes, bits of lace, letters, sachet-bags, patterns, handkerchiefs, jabots, remnants of millinery, bottles of perfume, no end of things, in fact, are discoverable in the top bureau drawer. Grown desperate, the woman who owns the heterogeneous collection that she regards as a disgrace has a periodical time for clearing it up, sorting it out, sending rubbish to the waste-basket and straightening out the tangle of things into apple-pie order. For the next week she can find nothing that she wants, and not until her drawer is a mass of hopeless confusion, into which she can dive with unerring accuracy, getting by magic the article she wants, does peace regain its throne in her breast.

Her husband surveys her with admiration. The science of the top drawer is beyond the masculine mind, that being symbolized by the carefully kept pigeon holes in the desk of a business man. Here, truly, is the equatorial line between the sexes.

The Strawberry Handkerchief

A Tale of Colonial Days in Old New York

By AMELIA E. BARR

CHAPTER SEVEN—Continued

WANDERING distractedly in the midst of apprehensions and self-upbraidings which the pleasures of deceit always bring, Virginia forgot the lapse of time. A dismal, sullen stillness succeeded her first passionate suffering, and bitter disquiet wrung her heart. It had become dark and cold. She was hungry and thirsty. Why did not her mother come to her?

But it was midnight when Madame Van Vroom visited her daughter.

She brought her some tea and bread and a lighted candle, and sat down without speaking.

"Moeder! Dear moeder!"

"What then?"

"How is my fader?"

"Why did thou do this wicked thing? To be the catspaw for those Artaveldts! For they were both in the plot. I say that, and I am right. Furious was Joris when thou sent him away the day Batavius came home. Dost thou think Joris would marry thee, if thou went to him? No such intentions has he. To beguile thee from thy home—to make thee look after their house and their comfort—to give thee orders and commands and hard words, if thou did not obey—these and such like were the plans of the two Artaveldts."

"Mother, I never promised to go to the Artaveldts, unless at the last moment every other hope had failed me, and it was Batavius or death."

"Even death would have been better."

"I am very young, moeder."

"What is thy meaning, by the last moment?"

"I thought surely God would make something happen."

"Take not God into thy selfish hopes; only one side—thy own side—can thou see and feel. More was at stake than thyself, but only of thyself can thou think. Listen now: if thou marry not Batavius, he will force thy father to break their partnership. Thy father will have to buy him out, or put up The Arms of Stuyvesant and the three coasters for sale. Thy father has not the money to buy Batavius out, and just now, when business is worth nothing, the ships and the goods at 14 Wall Street will go for a song. If thy father refuse to sell the ship for nothing at all, he will have to go to sea with her himself. Batavius will not go. I think myself he will join Van Heemskirk, for Van Heemskirk has long envied his skill in the East Indian trade."

"I thought father was rich, and Batavius under him."

"Thy father, I fear, has trusted Batavius too far. He said to me this hour that he believed Batavius could bankrupt him. And what dost thou think of thy father in the debtor's prison? Will Joris remember that he helped thee to put him there? Oh, no."

"Moeder, I knew not these things. What must I do? Tell me. Oh, my dear fader!"

"Thy dear fader! Speak not such words. For that poor creature, Joris Artaveldt, thou would willingly sacrifice thy dear fader's life."

"Moeder, have some pity on me."

"For so cruel a girl I have no pity. Full of sorrow is thy father, and lately every new calamity thou hast helped on. But now the whole storm is thyself—thou injurious, undutiful, ungrateful daughter!"

"What can I do? Oh, what can I do?"

"To-morrow, thy father will ask the dominie and his wife, Van Heemskirk and his wife, and Parker of the Gazette to take dinner with us the following day. He will then speak openly to them of thy marriage."

"My marriage! When?"

"It will be on some day next week."

"Moeder! Moeder! This is only the twenty-third of October, and Rose will not be here until the fifteenth of November."

"I take Rose Harley into no kind of consideration. She is against Batavius; her fine ladyship uses him only for her sport."

"I was promised until Saint Nicholas' Day. You will not break your word to me, moeder. Next week! It is impossible! I must have Rose to help me. I must wait for Rose. It is only until the fifteenth, moeder. She says that herself. See, here is her last letter. Read it, and you will see. Read it, moeder."

Madame carefully read the letter. There was not a word in it to excite suspicion—only the plainest commonplaces, and a positive promise to be in New York about the fifteenth of November; with a request that Virginia would put forward her marriage to about that date, so that it might happen before she had to sail for England.

"If you will let me wait for Rose, moeder, I will make you no more trouble. I will treat Batavius well. I will do all as you tell me. I will indeed."

"How can we trust thee? And about Batavius, I will tell thee one sure thing: he grows very cool about marrying thee. Joanna Van Heemskirk will take thy husband from thee."

"Perhaps—if I give her leave to do so. Not unless."

"Then for thy father's sake, show thy beauty and kindness a little more."

"Moeder dear, forgive me! I am grieved in my heart, to have made you so much trouble."

"Well, then, it is over. There is nothing for sin but sorrow."

"Very angry is my fader. Speak thou for me."

"Speak also for thyself, that is the right way. Do not think it is a little thing thou hast done. It is a great thing, and where it will end who can tell?"

"And my marriage? Moeder, let me have until the eighteenth. Oh, I am so young to die!"

"To die! Now what foolishness art thou talking?"

"It is the truth for me. On the eighteenth, my fader may open the big Bible, and write below my birth lines, 'Died November the eighteenth, 1765, aged eighteen years and four months.'" Then she began to cry softly at the prospective inscription.

"Now I will leave thee, for if this is thy way of 'making no more trouble' and of 'treating Batavius well,' I have little faith in any of thy promises."

And Virginia felt too hopeless to make further protest. A sudden despair invaded her heart, and as soon as she was alone she gave it full sway. In this tumult of fear and anxiety she fell asleep, and then her angel visited her. She cleared away all the wreckage and rubbish of her delusive hopes, and inspired her mind with confidence and courage. All was not yet lost. Before the eighteenth of November a great deal might happen. Then she rose and dressed herself with care, and went down to seek her father.

He was sitting by the fire in the living-room, waiting for his breakfast. His large frame was steeped in mournfulness; his head, his arms, his whole attitude slack and drooping. For he

What difference does it make, anyhow? Blankets are durable; and easily cleaned—if you go about it in the right way.

The best time to wash them is on a warm, sunny, breezy day in spring.

The best way to wash them is with Ivory Soap.

Follow the directions given below and your blankets will be as clean and soft and fluffy as when you bought them.

First, shake out the dust, then soak in warm suds of Ivory Soap for thirty minutes. Work the blankets up and down in the water, squeeze them against the sides of the tub, and put them through the wringer, loosely adjusted, into another strong suds of the same temperature as the first. Stir about and soak for ten minutes, stretch soiled parts over a smooth surface, and rub with a brush, using a little of a solution of Ivory Soap cut up and dissolved in hot water. Rinse in several warm waters—or until both blanket and water are clean—then hang to dry in the open air. Hang the blankets so that they will dry straight. When perfectly dry, rub the surface with a soft flannel cloth and hang them near a stove or in a warm room for several hours. For each pair of blankets, allow a half cake of Ivory Soap.

HONEST ADVERTISERS

THE advertising manager of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was explaining recently to a party of friends how much care is taken by most high-grade publications to keep their advertising pages above reproach, how every advertisement is scrutinized to see that it does not contain exaggerated statements, and how the integrity of each new advertiser is inquired into before his "copy" is accepted. A lady present looked her astonishment.

"Why," she exclaimed, "I did not suppose that publications took such trouble with their advertisers. I thought their advertising pages were open to the highest bidder, and that, as long as the advertiser had the money to pay, the proprietors of the magazines would let him make any statement he cared to."

Never was there a more erroneous conception of the modern art of advertising, and yet it is one that still lingers in the minds of a large number of people in spite of a general effort on the part of the better class of publications to eradicate it. Time was when a publication was considered a common carrier, and was held blameless for carrying a fraudulent advertisement, just as a railroad is held blameless when it carries a criminal as a passenger, but that day has gone by. The reputable advertising man of to-day has as high a code of ethics as any other professional man.

The general endeavor is to make the advertising columns clean, straightforward statements of fact, on which subscribers can absolutely rely for guidance in the purchase of all kinds of merchandise.

The general interest in magazine advertising is increasing, for one reason because the "ads" themselves grow more and more interesting in subject matter; for another because the faker and the swindler are being denied the use of a constantly increasing number of publications. People are beginning to understand that advertisements now mean just exactly what they say, and the time is surely coming, if it is not already here, when people will go shopping through the advertising columns of the magazines, with even more confidence and faith than they have in the public shops.

As for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, it guarantees its advertisements. Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within one month of the date of the appearance of the advertisement.

CONCERNING LIVING FOREVER*

IT is difficult to conceive of a civilization in which the idea of immortality is practically absent. The East Indian sects believe that it is "nirvana," a sort of a blissful condition of semi-consciousness; the Mohammedan looks forward to endless physical delights after death; the North American Indian was to hunt forever, under cloudless skies, through fruitful fields and through woods full of game, wandering endlessly on and on, victorious in war, and never cold nor hungry.

Nearly every ancient people seems to have had some definite condition to look forward to after death, excepting the Jews—the nation of all others which, it would seem, should have had the clearest, loftiest vision of heaven.

But see how much finer appears their great quest for righteousness from the fact of their short-sightedness. No reward was promised in a future life for this long earthly struggle after goodness. A good character in his follower would glorify God on earth and would produce inward peace.

They declare repeatedly that the Lord "shall endure forever"; and David says that God "lifteth him up from the gates of death"; and "will redeem my soul from the power of the grave." He foresees "pleasures at God's right hand forevermore," and knows that he will not "suffer his holy one to see corruption." He expects to "dwell in the house of the Lord forever."

But, on the other hand, in the 146th Psalm, David tells us that when man "returneth to the earth, in that very day his thoughts perish." His enemy, he says, has made him "to dwell in darkness, as those that have been long dead"; and, again, "the dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence." There are several other similar passages.

Perhaps this was expressly in order that Jesus should be the one to bring life and immortality to light; for with our Saviour came, appropriately and definitely to his followers, the most blessed hope that has ever cheered the heart of mankind. Nothing so much has altered the disposition of our race. When a great and noble hope is revealed to the world, it raises the whole plane of living.

For with it comes a new motive to achieve personal holiness. If we are to dwell forever in the palace of an almighty and stainless King, even the dullest can see that he must make himself fit for that great companionship. His whole life is none too long for the purging and the high schooling to which he should subject his spirit.

"It is pitiful," says Dr. J. R. Miller, "to see how men throw away their crowns. Made only a little lower than God, destined to be like Christ at length, they yield to appetite, lust and passion, and debase themselves in the dust. With this glory set before us, we should keep ourselves pure and our lives white, and should strive even here to reach up to the honor that is prepared for us."

AN INCIDENT OF THE BREAD LINE

THERE was a surprise in store for the unemployed men of the Bread Line of the Bowery Mission on the night of February 7, the coldest on record, when Mr. Hallimond announced that he had ten cents to present to each man, to enable him to procure a night's lodging. This donation, the superintendent told them, had come from a man who himself had been on the Bread Line just three or four weeks ago, but who had since become possessed of a small fortune of $1,000. One hundred dollars of this sum he had donated for the relief of such of the "down-and-outs" as were represented on the Bread Line of the Bowery Mission on that bitterly cold night, when any one compelled to be outdoors and shelterless was in danger of being frozen to death. It was a godsend to the poor fellows, and the generosity of their former companion in misfortune was heartily appreciated.

felt as if it was the eleventh hour of life, and all earthly things relating to himself going to wrack and ruin.

But when Virginia knelt at his knees, and with tears kissed his big hands, and then his lips, and cried, "Forgive me, fader! Fader, forgive your Virginia!" there was a quick resurrection of love and life and hope and joy. Before he knew, the dear child was sitting on his knee, and her arms were around his neck, and she was whispering her contrition against his lips.

When Madame and the breakfast came into the room the forgiveness was complete. They were talking about the tulip bulbs, and their removal into the seed house; and Madame understood the trouble to be dead and buried. As she poured out the coffee, she asked about the dinner to be given the following day, and hoped it would not be a large one.

"Only the dominie and his wife, and the Van Heemskirks, and Parker of the Gazette," answered the Captain.

"With Batavius that makes six. Will Arent be with us?"

"No. When not on the Manhattan, he is with those young watchdogs who are on the lookout, night and day, for the Stamps."

"Very good. Virginia will help me, and there will be a good dinner ready at one o'clock."

It was a hard day for Virginia, for Batavius came early, and she felt it right to regard her promise in a large manner. So she met him with a smile, and made him coffee, and told him about the dinner next day, and asked him how he wished her to dress. And Batavius forgot all her offenses, and joyed himself in the light of her beaming countenance. Astonished he certainly was; but Batavius always found it easy to accept any good thing, as in some way or other his natural right.

The next morning Virginia was her mother's right hand about everything, doing much she disliked doing with the utmost cheerfulness. But she did not feel that she was quite forgiven. No unkind words were said, no allusion made to her fault, but there was something like withdrawal on her mother's part, and in spite of kind words she saw an expression on her father's face of weariness and unhappiness. It was as if their life had lost its fulness, and become haggard and thin, and without interest.

When she went to her room to dress she considered this attitude. "I have lost their confidence," she thought. "I have fallen in their opinion. Confidence cannot be regained quickly, but the power of beauty is instantaneous and not to be resisted."

To such thoughts she dressed herself with great care, and when she entered the parlor where the company were already gathered her loveliness caused a quick, involuntary exclamation of delight. For, braving all political criticism, she had arrayed herself in a gown of soft, rich, white silk. Her exquisite arms and neck were uncovered, and round her throat was a necklace and pendant of fine moonstones. Moonstones shone from the combs that held high her bright, brown hair; moonstones closed the lace bertha that trimmed the waist of her gown; and she walked in their beauty as in a cool radiance like that of moonlight on gently heaving water. Her father advanced to meet her, but Batavius outstepped him, and she took the arm of Batavius.

"You see I am wearing the stones you gave me," she said with a smile that took the man captive ten times over.

"You shall have plenty more. You shall have silks and satins and gems of all kinds. I will dress you like a queen, my Virginia."

Successful Egg Farming

Among people who can afford luxuries there is great demand for a regular supply of fresh eggs. The few growers who can furnish them regularly winter and summer alike, get very high prices.

The Corning Egg-Book

(entitled "$6.41 per Hen per Year"), tells how two men, in poor health, starting four years ago with only thirty hens, made from their little egg-farm a clear profit of over $12,000 last year. It tells all about their experience, their failures, their methods; and how others, men or women, with good sense, care and faithful work, can make money in the same way. Not a detail left out.

The Corning Egg-Book is sold in combination with the Farm Journal, Philadelphia, Pa., but we have made arrangements to make this

Chats With the Young Folks

By Kate Upson Clark

A Scared Motorman

H vast majority of the dwellers in New York City, as in most other es have little or no summer vaca-. hey are lucky if they can spend or night, or even a week, in the sse country.

or quently, during the sweltering y d August days, the workers in h tenements are generally plan- g visit the nearby lakes and ch on every available evening and da he rip to Coney Island in an open i one of the cheapest and most ul of all. There are many di- in and innocent amusements at Land; but even if one can do ir more than take the ride, it is ic tly cooling and refreshing.

me hot evening in August the st family thought they would go Joy Island.

he were father and mother Bar- , nd Emily, John and Louisa, d spectively fourteen, nine and yers.

No, you mustn't tease to see the its t the Island." said the mother. a ll take the ride, and that will a ollar. Then we will buy a bag ea its for you and one of popcorn, wk around a little, so that you 't stiff from sitting so long. It c too much if we try to take toee any of the shows."

Be les, it will make us too late in in ome," said the father.

he children promised that they ld ot tease. Little Louisa was ar for the excursion by a long rn n nap. The family had an y pper, and shortly after six ck hey were on their way to Co- Isl nd.

he were able, both in going and in to get the whole of the front o an open car, which just held fiv of them.

ob y but one who has tried it ws he joy which comes to the hot stky city child as he, little by e, des out from the stifling city an feels the cool breezes of the arb and then the strong, fresh d o the ocean.

The arstow family enjoyed all this, th had walked about a little on beh. They had bought the prom- p corn and peanuts and were in ell settled upon their airy t at when a startling event rre h not taken long for the pop- a peanuts to disappear. Both be served in strong, tight paper . mily held one of these and a hd the other.

"I'll t I can blow up my bag and e bigger noise than you can," Joh.

"No y can make a bigger noise I an with a good paper bag," rte Emily, examining hers as ful as she could in the dim light.

"Wel we'll see," said John. "Now ."

The ther and mother did not no- wlt was going on. They were ing usily in a low voice, with the e ol between them, dozing as she ine on her mother's arm. The orm n was equally unobservant.

Sudd ly two sharp, deafening ex- ion rent the air, one following a e a er the other.

Quic as a flash the motorman pec he car, slipped off his motor dle nd was down flat on the and looking under the car. The duct , pale and agitated, was close de m. A dozen passengers also g th mselves off the car and began eer nderneath it.

"You heard that fuse go off, didn't ?" s d the motorman.

"Sure, I heard it," responded the conductor.

"Oh, it went off all right," chimed in the onlooking passengers.

"But nothing seems to be on fire or wrong," said the perplexed motorman, scrambling to his feet.

"Let me look," said the conductor, in a distrustful tone of voice.

But nobody could find anything out of order, though the car was held up for ten minutes or more, together with a long line of others.

Which was not strange, since it was only the paper bags of the Barstows, and not an exploding fuse, which had so alarmed all these people.

The young Barstows themselves did not sense the situation until the excitement was nearly over and the car was speeding on again. Their parents had no idea of it even then. They really thought that it was something about the car which had "gone off."

"Shall we tell mother?" whispered John.

They finally did tell her, and the front seat went into spasms of laughter.

But they decided not to tell the motorman. They thought he might be so angry that he would dump them all out into the wilds of Parkville.

How He Knew

A CERTAIN warship was lying in a Northern harbor, and one of its young officers was instructing a volunteer naval brigade in gun manœuvre.

He showed them several different kinds of guns, and explained their mechanism. Once, however, his knowledge failed him. One of the guns was a new model and something about the breech mechanism was novel and perplexing.

"This, gentlemen," he began in a bewildered way, "this—this——"

He paused. He evidently did not know what "this" was.

One of the volunteer naval brigade spoke up modestly:

"Excuse me, sir; it is for range-finding."

He went on and explained clearly the working of the new device. His words were few, and he presently stopped and stepped back into his place.

The officer looked annoyed.

"You don't know what you are talking about, sir. We have had this thing on hand only about three weeks."

"I know, sir," stammered the young man, blushing painfully, "but, you see—I am the one who invented it."

The haughty lieutenant then had to "give in." There was no more to be said.

Appreciation From Sick Room

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I want to write you a word of thanks for the two pictures which I received. That of the sleeping baby is one of the most artistic and natural of baby life I have ever seen. I have had it framed and it looks beautiful! I think a sepia picture looks richer than an ordinary black-and-white. I want to thank you also for the picture, "Golden Hours," which I received. I have been sick in bed since last July, so The Christian Herald is a great comfort to me. After I have read it, I send it to the widow of a minister in Still River, Mass.; then she sends it to some one else. (Mrs.) Dorothy Lent.

Another Faithful Witness

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received the following letter, suggested by a tribute to Adolph Koch, of Chicago, which appeared in this paper several weeks ago. While we know that "God is love" and that "He is faithful that promised," we are conscious of the need of and appreciative of the great benefit resulting from the testimony of our fellow-men:

"NEW YORK, February 5, 1910.

"The beautiful little poem and the synopsis of 'A Victorious Life' is very touching and sad, as it took me back to a similar life—that of my brother, and the death of his wife and one child, within a few days of each other—but his one beautiful thought was that, although he was left alone, God had them in his keeping, and he would see them some day. My brother, too, had been a successful business man, and had lost two fortunes, but never his faith in God. His health failed him, and for many years he suffered great pain, never murmuring. He was afflicted with locomotor ataxia, and was moved about in a wheel-chair, as he could not walk, and he was blind. He was always cheerful, and his greatest comfort was his beautiful tenor voice, which he loved to use in hymns of praise to his Maker. The Sunday before his death my sister, and the friends who knew and loved him in Holland, all said that on that last Sunday his voice could be heard above all others at the service. My sister had an attachment made in the end of the pew, to keep him from falling out, and he was wheeled each Sunday, rain or shine, to church and placed in his pew, where he was so happy to be. He is buried in a little churchyard at Scheveningen, overlooking the North Sea, where he had been taken each day to be near the sea, which he loved, but could not look upon. He knew the Bible well, and was so familiar with the church service, with its beautiful hymns and prayers, that he had no difficulty in participating. He had hoped from boyhood to enter the ministry, but circumstances, which gave him the care of his mother and sisters, prevented. My mother always called him her little 'Benjamin.' She died before him. She knew very little of his suffering, as he insisted we should not tell her. L. B. P."

Astronomical Queries

BY PROF. S. P. LELAND, SEABREEZE, FLA.

S. S. W., Pulaski, Va. How do you know that Halley's comet, by Whitsunday, will be 95,000,000 miles from the earth? Please explain how astronomers ascertain distances between comets and the earth.

Astronomers have many methods of measurement of distances, all of which are more or less mathematical. In a brief answer, like this, it is impossible to explain these. They are only acquired by study. In the case of Halley's comet, its path in the sky has been clearly defined, and its rate of speed ascertained. These being known, it is easy to tell the time that it will be at any given point in its path.

E. E. S., Jr., Wausau, Wis. Can you tell me why Greenwich, England, was chosen as the reckoning point of longitude?

There was no particular reason why Greenwich Observatory was adopted as the unit of reckoning, except that it was one of the first observatories. It was constructed in 1675, and a year after became the Royal Observatory by receiving the endorsement of royalty. It was the most perfectly arranged of any, and the comparative perfection of its instruments called to it the leading astronomers. These conditions gave it favor; and maps and tables were constructed there, and reckonings were made from that point.

Grace B., Bristol, Vt. Can you give me the dates of the known appearances of Halley's comet? Also, were there any notable events occurring in the world in those years?

The first record of Halley's comet was in the year 12 B.C., and it has reappeared about every seventy-six years since. No notable events outside the usual occurrences have accompanied its several appearances. Comets have no determined influence on the events of human history. Superstition has fabricated many things to terrify the ignorant. Science dismisses all such claims. When nearest the earth, the comet will be an exhibition of magnificence and grandeur.

Music Lessons Free

IN YOUR OWN HOME

A wonderful offer to every lover of music whether a beginner or an advanced player

Ninety-six lessons (or a less number, if desire) for either Piano, Organ, Violin, Guitar, Cornet, Sight Singing, Mandolin or Cello given free to make our home study courses for instruments known in your locality. You get one lesson weekly, and your only expense during the time you take the lessons will be cost of postage and the music you use, which is small. Write at once. It will mean much to get our free booklet. It will place you under no obligation whatever to us if you never write again. You and your friends should know of this work. Hundreds of our pupils write: "If I had known of your school before." "I learned more in one term in my home with your weekly lessons than in three terms with private teachers, and at a great deal less expense." "Everything is so thorough and complete." "The lessons are marvels of simplicity, and my 12 year old boy has not had the least trouble to learn." One minister writes: "As each succeeding lesson comes I am more and more fully persuaded that I made no mistake in becoming your pupil."

Established 1898—have thousands of pupils from seven years of age to seventy.

Don't say you cannot learn music but send for our free booklet and tuition offer. It will be sent by return mail free. Address U. S. SCHOOL OF MUSIC, Box 7, 225 Fifth Ave., New York City.

No Need to Have Soggy Salt

You see, when you visit any fine cafe, that some salt always flows. Ask for the reason and you will be told, "We use only Shaker Salt."

Every home can get that same salt. Every good grocer sells it. All that is necessary is to insist on genuine Shaker Salt.

Exceedingly Dry

Shaker Salt isn't mixed with starch. It flows because it is fine and dry. And it comes in a paraffined, sanitary, dampproof box to protect it.

We remove the gypsum from Shaker Salt by an elaborate process which we control. This gypsum is found in all natural salt, and no other maker removes it.

Gypsum is Plaster of Paris—a pebble former, the basis of gall stones and gravel. Yet from no table salt save Shaker is the gypsum filtered out.

Not Costly

Shaker Salt costs but 10 cents per year over common, coarse, soggy bag salt. Every housewife can afford this pure, dry, dainty salt.

But get the genuine Shaker Salt, for no other table salt offers these advantages. It is a pity not to have the best in so cheap a thing as salt.

Price, east of the Rockies, 10c per box.

Our Lookout Round the World

GREAT floods in the Meuse Valley, Belgium, have caused immense damage and thrown thousands of men out of work.

—MANY rivers East, West and South are now in full flood. The Hudson and its tributaries and the Ohio are inundating the low-lying lands, causing serious damage and rendering thousands temporarily homeless.

—PRESIDENT TAFT has instructed the American Ambassador in St. Petersburg to make strong representations to the Russian government, looking to the protection of American citizens of Jewish birth now traveling in Russia under American passports.

—ALTHOUGH Turkey has reformed its constitution, it has not changed its attitude toward its Christian subjects. Stories of cruel persecution come from the Turko-Greek frontier. Christian villages were sacked, the inhabitants imprisoned, and in some cases the occupants driven off and the places repeopled by Turks.

—THERE is some doubt whether the proposed American Exhibition in Berlin will be carried out as originally planned. The American Committee in Berlin suggested that the exhibition should be a German-American, instead of a strictly American, enterprise; but the majority of Americans in Germany oppose the change, and insist on carrying through the original plans.

—SECRETARY of the Navy Meyer favors the construction of a 32,000-ton battleship, armed with fourteen-inch batteries of the latest type. Such a vessel would eclipse all the existing Dreadnoughts, and a few more of the same gigantic type would give us the strongest navy in the world. It is only a few years since a 14,000-ton battleship was declared by experts to be the limit of naval construction.

—GREAT demonstrations have taken place in Germany in the interest of full suffrage and against existing laws governing the ballot. In Berlin a mass meeting of 14,000 "intellectuals" adopted resolutions calling for equal political rights for all classes. A procession started to visit the Kaiser's palace, but was dispersed by the police. At Frankfort 50,000 persons attended the suffrage meetings, and adopted similar resolutions.

—THE Dalai Lama of Tibet is reported to have appealed to China, protesting against the invasion of his capital. The Chinese government has set forth its intentions regarding Tibet. The interior administration will not be changed, but Chinese control strengthened because of the machinations of the deposed Lama, and the capital will be policed. The Lama was degraded, the explanation states, because of offenses he had committed.

—CONTRARY to the gloomy forebodings of some people, Mr. Roosevelt's African trip has not injured his health. Both he and his son Kermit were in excellent condition when they reached Gondokoro, after their year's trip in interior Africa. At one point in their travels they were greeted by a large gathering of white hunters from the Congo, who came to pay their respects to the Ex-President, whose prowess with the rifle has made him a great man in their eyes.

—MARCH 2 was a record day for immigrant arrivals at New York. Seven thousand six hundred and thirty-one men, women and children, from many different countries, reached port within twenty-four hours.

—ELIZABETH HAYS, an unmarried woman of eighty, who was supposed to be in dire poverty, died in her old farmhouse near Burlington, N. J., lately. Search in the old house revealed a secret hoard of over $100,000. Bank notes were hidden among the table linen and in bed springs, in old coffee pots, cupboards, presses, salt bags, etc. An old family Bible was interleaved with $20 notes, some of the date of the Civil War. The hoard included, besides notes, double eagles and coins of copper, silver, nickel and gold.

—THE New York and New Jersey authorities are pushing the prosecution of the meat packers vigorously. The public prosecutor of Hudson County, New Jersey, who procured the indictment of the packers on the charge of conspiracy in raising prices of meat and poultry, has applied to the courts for an order commanding the indicted companies to produce their books before the Hudson County Grand Jury. He has also applied for requisition papers for the indicted packers residing in other States, to come before the Jersey courts.

—A TEMPORARY arrangement has been reached by the different factions in the English Parliament, for the purpose of avoiding another general election, which would have been inevitable had the Liberals been left to their own resources. The Liberals, Premier Asquith's party, have agreed with the Unionists that only finance bills will be taken up until after the Easter holidays, and that any movement against the Lords will be postponed to a later day. This plan leaves the political situation unchanged, and in the meantime the budget, on which the last election hinged, will be sidetracked until "a more convenient season." It is explained, however, by the Liberal leaders that the fight against the Lords will be resumed in full force at the proper time.

—AVALANCHES in the Cascade Mountains, east of Seattle, Wash., overwhelmed two trains on the Great Northern Railroad at the little station of Wellington, on March 1. The disaster took place a short distance from the famous Cascade tunnel. A great mass of ice, snow and rock swept down the mountains and flung the trains to the bottom of a gorge, 150 feet deep. The Spokane express and transcontinental limited mail were the trains that were overtaken. A third train, consisting of working cars and no passengers, was also caught in the avalanche, and also a fourth, consisting of baggage, mail and express cars. More than one hundred lives were lost, the victims including thirty members of a party of rescuers. Four hundred men arrived on relief trains for the work of rescue. The avalanche came down at four in the morning, while most of the passengers on the trains and the people of the little town were asleep.

Woman's Part in the Temperance War

By MARGARET DYE ELLIS

THAT the Woman's Christian Temperance Union has been, and is, a mighty factor in helping to bring to pass the great prohibition movement of the present day is, we believe, universally conceded. At the very outset of their career, with all odds against them, they dared take the position for the highest and best, declaring to the world, "We believe in total abstinence for the individual and constitutional prohibition for State and nation."

To this end has been their endeavor. Commencing with but a handful of earnest women, after long years of patient, unceasing effort they see every State and Territory in the Union organized, including the District of Columbia, Alaska, the Canal Zone, Hawaii and the Philippine Islands, and locally in twelve thousand towns and cities, besides being organized in fifty countries of the world.

Margaret Dye Ellis

Its auxiliaries have been the chief factors in State campaigns for statutory prohibition and constitutional amendments, and for securing the enactment of other reform laws, especially those for the protection of women and girls.

Furthermore, we find nine States under State-wide prohibition, thirty-six million people of our own land living under some form of prohibitory law, the sale of intoxicating liquor prohibited in both Army and Navy, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union being among the first to urge upon Congress the necessity of providing a place where enlisted men could find recreation and amusement without visiting the dive or the near-by saloon. Up to the present time Congress has appropriated over three million dollars for the "post exchange" at Army posts and garrisons, in which are to be found amusement halls, finely equipped gymnasiums, bowling alleys, reading-rooms, etc., for the benefit of enlisted men, besides a little more variety in "mess" being allowed them. Rural free delivery carriers are prohibited from carrying liquors, either for themselves or their patrons, while in possession of the mail; the sale of liquor prohibited in the Capitol building at Washington, D. C., and at our ports of entry.

Its forty-four departments of work are divided into six great divisions: Organization, Preventive, Educational, Evangelistic, Social and Legal—a specialist at the head of each department.

Thirty organizers are constantly in the field, largely in pioneer territory; six hundred thousand meetings were held last year under the auspices of the W. C. T. U. Missionaries are kept at Ellis Island and other ports of entry, who distribute literature in twenty different languages to the thousands of immigrants passing through these doors into our land. Missionaries in lumber camps and in mining sections work among colored people and Indians.

Sixteen million children are being taught in the public schools what scientific research has secured concerning the effects of alcohol and other narcotics upon the human system. Children thus instructed have grown to manhood and womanhood, and are now wielding an influence in the home and at the ballotbox for the principles of prohibition.

Through the department of medical temperance a crusade against concealed alcohol in proprietary and patent medicines has been carried on, which has resulted in agitation for legislation requiring the publication of the ingredients used, and awakened the church and secular press to the danger lurking in medicine.

For sixteen years the national superintendent of the department of legislation has remained in Washington, D. C., during the sessions of Congress, to look after reform measures, and in every State during the session of its Legislature is a representative of the State W. C. T. U. stationed to keep women informed as to the progress of legislation in the State and to aid in the passage of reform bills.

And thus is this great leavening power being used of God to the pulling down of the "strongholds of Satan."

MARGARET DYE ELLIS,
National Superintendent of Legislation for the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, Washington, D. C.

Temperance Notes

Governor Hoch on the "Dry Wave"

EX-GOVERNOR HOCH of Kansas is sanguine of the complete success of temperance throughout the country. At a recent meeting in Chicago he delivered an address, in the course of which he said: "There is absolutely nothing to be said in favor of the saloon. As soon as the Middlefield bill, or some other like it, gets through Congress, to make shipments of liquor into dry territory contraband, the remaining great obstacle to prohibition will be removed. I say that any man who occupies a Governor's seat for four years must of necessity become a prohibitionist."

Judged by the Company We Keep

A MAN under the influence of liquor was passing along an uptown street in New York one night lately when he saw two men, one of whom apparently wanted to open a store, but was experiencing some difficulty. The semi-intoxicated man kindly volunteered to help him, and while he was doing so a policeman came along and arrested all three. In court it came out that two of the men were professional burglars, and the third—the drunken man—was merely a casual observer, whose brain was so muddled with liquor that he did not know what he was doing. The criminals pleaded guilty to attempted burglary, and the honest drunkard was warned by the judge, who suspended sentence, that if he ever got into trouble again within the next twenty-five years he could be brought back to court and tried over as an accomplice. He left the court a different man, vowing to stay sober for the next quarter of a century.

GOVERNMENT BONDS

WE have received a number of inquiries lately from subscribers who desire to learn something concerning government bonds. One of these letters in particular is representative of the general attitude. It states in part:

"You have cautioned us to invest only in securities of proved worth, from a banker of recognized integrity. Now, what better security could we have than the government? If I buy a government bond, it seems to me it does not matter of whom I purchase it. If it is a bona fide government security, my interests are protected. Is this not so?"

Undoubtedly. No one would attempt to predict that the United States Government would ever fail to keep its bonded promises. Then why not buy government bonds in preference to municipal, railroad, irrigation, or other similar securities? There are several reasons.

The bond issued by a railroad or other public utilities company is that company's written promise to pay a certain amount of money, after a certain period has elapsed, with interest payable at intervals for the use of the money. In order to guarantee such payment, the company mortgages, in favor of the bond issue, certain properties which are actually in its possession, and which may be sold for the benefit of the bondholder if the company fails to make good its written promise to pay.

Buying Bonds on Faith

The government exacts this obligation of private corporations, but in its own case it does not create any underlying mortgage upon which the bondholders can rely in case of non-payment of the face of the bond. In other words, government bonds are bought on faith, and in effect the bondholder simply takes the word of Uncle Sam that he will pay the amount of the bond and interest when it is due. However, the integrity of the United States is built upon such substantial foundations that it is hard to think of any calamity that could bring about the complete financial failure of the national government.

War, to be sure, might reduce the amount of its available finances temporarily, but the resources of the country at large, the personal prosperity of the people, which is intertwined with the general prosperity of the nation, are factors which would prevent even the semblance of such a calamity as would be involved in the failure of the United States Government to pay its debts.

This being the case, why are not government bonds more eagerly sought by the small investor? For one thing, they usually pay but 2 per cent. interest a year, and most people want more than that amount of interest upon their capital, particularly in these days of rising prices. Where, then, does the government find a market for its bonds, when such a low rate of interest is paid? As a matter of fact, at least 90 per cent. of the bonds issued by the government are taken up by banks, for reasons which are intricately connected with the general currency system.

How Currency Is Issued

Examine any number of small currency bills and you will find that most of the ones and twos are what are known as "silver certificates," issued by the "United States of America." Look at some tens, twenties, and larger bills, and you will find that many of these are issued, apparently, by various banks. They will probably state that, in return for the privilege of issuing this currency, a similar amount of money has been deposited in the United States Treasury in Washington. Now how does a bank gain by depositing a certain amount of money in Washington and then issuing a bill in its place? As a matter of fact, the bank does not necessarily deposit actual coin.

The practice of the banks has been to buy up government bonds, upon which they can make a profit of 2 per cent. interest paid by the government. After these bonds are purchased of the government by a bank, the latter makes a request of the government for so much currency to be issued in its own name. It deposits with the government as security for that currency a similar amount of the very bonds which it has just purchased of the government, and inasmuch as they are its own issue the government naturally considers them good security. The banks then take this currency, which they receive in exchange for the bonds, and lend it out at interest.

Bonds Profitable for Banks

If the bank puts this currency out with the interest at, say, 6 per cent., it is then making on the transaction not only the 6 per cent., but also the 2 per cent. which the government pays for its bonds, which have been deposited with the United States Treasury as security for the currency. Thus the bank is enabled to make a profit of 8 per cent. But an individual investor could not do this. The best he could make would be 2 per cent., since individuals are not granted the privilege of issuing currency. And so it happens that probably 90 per cent. of the bonds issued by the government are in the hands of banks; or, rather, they are deposited in Washington as security for a similar amount of currency, which the people of the United States use as money.

Why does not the government issue all of the money? It will be found that the government could not afford to pay the same interest on its bonds as is paid by private corporations. The private corporation is operated, primarily, for profit, whereas the United States Government, although the aim is to operate it at a profit, exists primarily for the benefit of the whole people. The private corporation can afford to pay larger rates of interest upon bonds issued by it; rates which would be prohibited in governmental transactions. And so, by allowing the banks to deposit its own bonds with it as security for currency, the government is enabled to make at least 2 per cent., and the banks, in their turn, can take up the bonds at a profit because of the currency feature, which enables them to earn so much additional interest.

3½ Per Cent. Not Large Enough

There has been some talk lately of a new issue of Panama bonds. The Panama Canal is costing the government so much money that it may soon be necessary for the government to raise a large sum to carry on the work. It is proposed to issue a new series of bonds, which could be taken up by the people. In times of stress the government has occasionally issued bonds for popular consumption, upon which it has agreed to pay a larger amount of interest than usual, such as, for instance, the series issued to cover the expenses of the Spanish War, when governmental 4 per cents were taken up in quantities by the people at large. That, however, was practically an emergency case.

The question of raising money for the Panama Canal is not quite so urgent as was that of the Spanish War loan, but it is suggested, nevertheless, to interest the people at large in the project by issuing a series of bonds at 3½ per cent. interest. This, with absolute surety of payment on the part

Christ's Resurrection*

THE vital meaning of our text may be thus expressed: "You are going to die and be with Christ. Then you will live forever with him. He was dead to sin while on earth. You must also be dead to sin while here. Your real life here must be in constant companionship with God. Thus is typified the heavenly life after the death of the grave."

This is a wonderful and a sobering thought to us who are "compassed about with infirmities," which expose us daily to the attacks of the evil one.

We all know that we ought to be dead to sin. The spear of Satan should strike against an impervious armor whenever he aims it at us; but, alas, it is not so!

Fortunately, though, like the great apostle, we find ourselves serving with the flesh the law of sin; still, if with the mind we serve the law of God, the Spirit helpeth our infirmities, and maketh effectual intercession for us.

Thus cometh to us, little by little, that resurrection of the spirit, the gradual attainment of holiness, which is figured in that strong eleventh verse of our lesson; thus we shall be, through Christ's help, "alive unto God."

But how shall we fight the persistent enemy? How shall we be strong and wide awake every day to meet his thousand cunning devices?

There is an old poem which tells of a goodly knight, who rode forth determined to do "something great."

He met a poor mother, whose child was lost. She begged him to help her search for it.

No; he was sorry, but he had more important work to do. So he rode on. Constantly he met sorrowing ones, who pleaded for help and sympathy; or rejoicing ones, who invited him to share their pleasure. But he was deaf alike to all. Their affairs were of slight consequence. He was looking for grander work. So

The years rolled on and his eyes grew dim,
And he died, and none made moan for him.
He missed the good he might have done,
He missed the blessings he might have won.
He that is faithful in that which is least
Is bidden to sit at the heavenly feast.

This gives us a hint as to the daily battle. If we are constantly looking for a chance to do the small duty, and if we do it faithfully and lovingly when we find it, Satan can never pierce a joint in our armor and we shall be "dead to sin."

Do you restrain yourself from making the irritating or angry reply? Do you keep yourself in the background, letting others have the glory? Do you decline every chance to make a profit which is unfair to others? Do you give up a gay entertainment in order to go to some meeting of your church or society (or do you choose the lively and shallow amusement, saying to yourself the oft-given excuse, "I can go to meeting any time, but I can't often go to an entertainment like that")?

These are the "little things" which make a man's life like that of God, which show that he has truly died to sin, and that his spirit has risen into a loftier life than that of the flesh.

But such little conquests come only with constant, earnest prayer, and the study of God's Word.

Could Not Keep House Without It

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I received, not long ago, the premium which was included with my year's subscription for 1910, namely, the book, The Story Bible, by Margaret Sangster. I do not understand how you can afford to give such premiums, as the paper itself is well worth the money. We could not keep house now without our weekly pleasure, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

WHAT'S THE USE

Sticking to a Habit when it Means Discomfort?

Old King Coffee knocks subjects out tolerably flat at times, and there is no possible doubt of what did it. A Mich. woman gives her experience:

"I used to have liver trouble nearly all of the time and took medicine which relieved me only for a little while. Then every once in a while I would be suddenly doubled up with an awful agony in my stomach. It seemed as though every time I took a breath I would die. No one could suffer any more and live.

"Finally I got down so sick with catarrh of the stomach that I could not turn over in bed, and my stomach did not digest even milk. The doctor finally told me that if I did not give up drinking coffee I would surely die, but I felt I could not give it up.

"However, Husband brought home a package of Postum and it was made strictly according to directions. It was the only thing that would stay on my stomach, and I soon got so I liked it very much.

"Gradually I began to get better, and week by week gained in strength and health. Now I am in perfect condition, and I am convinced that the whole cause of my trouble was coffee-drinking, and my getting better was due to leaving off coffee and taking Postum.

"A short time ago I tasted some coffee and found, to my astonishment, that I did not care anything about it. I never have to take medicine any more. I hope you will use this letter for the benefit of those suffering from the poisonous effects of coffee."

Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

I Will Help You to

By Assisting Nature in a Scientific Manner

In the privacy of your own room, surprise your friends and friends. After my university course, I concluded I could be of greater help to my sex by assisting Nature to regain and retain the strength of every vital organ, by bringing it a good circulation of the blood, by strengthening the nerves, and by teaching deep breathing, that could by correcting bad ailments with medicine.

I've helped over 44,000 women. I can help you to give to you that satisfaction with self which comes through knowledge that you're developing the sweet personal loveliness which health and a wholesome graceful body gives—a cultured, self-reliant woman with a definite purpose which makes you the greatest help to family and friends. You will be a Better Wife, a Rested, Merrier, a Sweeter Sweetheart.

I'll help you to make every vital organ and nerve do efficient work, thus clearing the complexion and correcting such ailments as

Constipation Irritability Indigestion
Weak Nerves	Colds	Dullness
Rheumatism	Nervousness	Weaknesses
Sleeplessness	Torpid Liver	Catarrh

The work is done by following simple directions a few minutes each day in the privacy of your own room. In delicate cases I co-operate with the physician.

A Good Figure is Economy

and means more than a pretty face

I've corrected thousands of figures as illustrated. Style is in the figure and poise and not in the gown. The gown in Fig. 1 cost $250; the one in Fig. 2 cost $6. Fig. 2 is the same woman as in Fig. 1, developed and in correct poise. Figs. 3, 4, 5 and 6 show actual photographs of pupils before taking up my work. (They have given me permission to use them). They all stand, now, as correctly and appear as well as Fig. 2. When every organ of the body is doing efficient work, there will be no superfluous flesh and no bony, angular bodies. I have reduced thousands of women 50 lbs., and have built up thousands of others 25 lbs. What I have done for others I can do for you. Here are a few extracts from daily reports of my pupils:

To Stout or To Thin

"My height has increased 30 pounds." "My kidneys are much better." "My eyes are much stronger and I have taken off my glasses." "I have not had a sign of indigestion or gall stones since I began with you." "I weigh 83 lbs. less and have gained wonderfully in strength. I never gat out of breath, the rheumatic twinges have all gone, and I look and feel 15 years younger." "Do think of it! To be relieved from constipation. Entirely free from having it for 30 years." "Have grown from a nervous wreck into a state of steady, quiet nerves."

Write me today, telling your faults of health and figure. If I can help you, I will tell you so. I study your case just as a physician, giving you the individual treatment which your case demands. I never violate a pupil's confidence. I will send you an instructive booklet, showing correct lines of a woman's figure in standing and walking, free.

of the government, would make the issue very attractive. Financiers, however, make an objection that if the government were to issue a series of bonds at 3½ per cent. this would immediately cause a depreciation in the value of the 2 per cent. bonds already held by the banks, because, they argue, no one would want to buy a 2 per cent. bond when you could get one yielding 3½ per cent. for the same price. The Treasury officials suggest that this difficulty might be obviated in the following way:

At the present time the banks are charged a small per cent., not more than ½ per cent. for the privilege of issuing currency. If the 3½ per cent. bonds are issued, it is suggested that the government charge the banks 1½ per cent. for the currency-issuing privilege. This cost of 1½ per cent. would cut down the bank profit on the 3½ per cent. bonds so much that the old 2 per cent. bonds would still be as profitable to them for currency-issuing purposes.

Even so, it is probable that if such an issue of bonds is made by the government the most of it will be absorbed by the banks, because, while the government is absolutely sure pay, yet a profit of 3½ per cent. is really too small for the individual investor to consider it seriously. Investors with very large sums of money might take up large blocks of such securities with the knowledge that the trouble of looking after many small investments would be eliminated. But the man or woman with a few hundred dollars, even a few thousand dollars, to invest must necessarily place such small amounts of capital in some field of investment that will return a more profitable yield.

For one thing the cost of living has increased so much in recent years that it becomes a matter of necessity for people to earn more than they did formerly. For the same reason, money must be made to earn more than it did in previous years. How to do this safely is, of course, the problem. But it is undoubtedly true that there are many ventures which are perfectly safe for the purpose of investing money and which yield far more than the 3½ per cent. which it is proposed to pay for the coming issue of government bonds. It all comes back to the caution, which has been repeated continually in these columns:

Buy only those bonds which are issued by companies which possess enough real property, so that the underlying mortgage will absolutely secure the principal, no matter how bad the outcome, and buy them only of firms of guaranteed integrity.

Children's Revival in China

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Orphanage boys and girls were wonderfully stirred by the great revival in Hinghua. Several boys were converted, and were greatly interested in the salvation of the other boys and girls. These held group prayer meetings and talked to their friends. Paul, one of the small boys, brought groups of other boys to the prayer-room. It was a touching array of proofs of repentance which these children brought in.

Balls, knives and lead-pencils, bits of cloth and handkerchiefs were brought to be restored to their owners. They had been picked up as lost articles, and the temptation had come to keep them. Confessions were made of deception, of unfaithfulness to duty, of pride and of wilful hearts. There was evidence of real repentance, followed by faith in the pardoning Saviour, and the outcome was peace and rest and the witness of the Holy Spirit.

ELIZABETH F. BREWSTER.

The Trend of Demand is Toward Safe 6% Bonds Secured by a Thousand Farms

Among our thousands of customers the present demand decidedly favors Reclamation bonds—six per cent farm lien securities.

We handle bonds of many kinds—Municipal, Corporation and Public Utility. But the demand for Reclamation bonds, with us, now exceeds the demand for all others combined.

One reason is, we have educated our customers regarding this class of security. And the facts are very appealing.

Based on Farm Liens

Our Reclamation bonds are secured by first liens on the most fertile and valuable farm lands in America.

On this reclaimed land the yield of standard crops will average two to four times that of other localities. And much of this land, devoted to fruit culture, attains a value of from $1,000 to $4,000 per acre.

To purchase this land, or to buy water rights, the individual land owners give first liens on their farms. These liens bear six per cent. interest, and are paid in annual installments.

Often a thousand such liens, on a thousand separate farms, are deposited with a trustee as security for the bonds as a whole. Thus an occasional individual delinquency cannot affect the security.

The land is worth generally at least four times the bonded indebtedness. The first crop is often sufficient to pay the whole lien.

The installments which the farmers pay on their liens are used to retire the bonds as they mature. Thus the security, while ample at the start, is increased by each annual payment.

Additional Security

The bonds are additionally secured by a first mortgage on all the property of the corporation which is reclaiming the land. The investment in this property is sometimes twice the bond issue. Thus we combine prompt and business-like corporate management with farm lien securities.

Some of these bonds are "Carey Act" bonds, where the State supervises the project. Some are Municipal securities, issued by organized districts. Such bonds, like school bonds, form a tax lien on the district.

All of these classes, when wisely selected, form ideal investments. One can hardly conceive of any better security.

A Fair Income

Reclamation bonds pay six per cent. interest—the same as the farmers pay on their individual liens. This is an unusual rate for such ample security. It is a higher income than one can obtain from most other classes of high-grade bonds.

The high cost of living is forcing many investors to seek higher interest returns. Many of our customers are now exchanging through us their low income bonds for Reclamation securities.

The bonds are for $100, $500 and $1,000, so they appeal to both small investors and large. They are serial bonds, running from 1 to 20 years, so one may make long-time or short-time investments.

We know of no other bonds which in so many ways appeal to the careful investor.

78 Issues Sold

In the past 16 years we have sold 78 separate issues of Reclamation bonds, all based on farm liens. Not a dollar of loss has resulted to any investor.

Our own engineers and attorneys—the most competent we know—investigate every project on which we purchase bonds. An officer of our Company constantly resides in the irrigated sections watching the projects we finance.

Our dominant place in this field of investment gives us the pick of all projects. Thus our Reclamation bonds are the cream of the issues.

We invite correspondence. Our book on Irrigation bonds is the best of the kind ever issued.

Every investor, small or large, owes to himself its perusal. Cut out this coupon as a reminder to write for the book today.

KEEPING POULTRY BY THE PHILO SYSTEM

PHILO NATIONAL POULTRY INSTITUTE — 27,000 SQUARE FEET OF FLOOR SPACE

WE GUARANTEE

That any intelligent person can make a profit of ONE HUNDRED PER CENT. on an investment in the Poultry business by the PHILO SYSTEM, and our GUARANTEE IS BACKED BY worth of real estate in the city of Elmira, consisting of thirty acres of land and the complete plant of the PHILO NATIONAL POULTRY INSTITUTE. This entire plant and equipment has been completely paid for out of the earnings of the poultry and poultry supply business by the PHILO SYSTEM.

The discoveries made to perfect the PHILO SYSTEM are the results of forty-one years' experience by one person experimenting and investigating the poultry business. We know that still larger profits can be and are being made by following our instructions, or we would not risk a hundred thousand dollars to back our guarantee. Our book, the PHILO SYSTEM, tells how to do the work from start to finish and gives you the right to use all our inventions and discoveries to get such wonderful returns.

If in doubt about our responsibility and the value of our guarantee, write Mr. D. M. Pratt, President, The Second National Bank, Elmira, N. Y., or any other reliable party.

The Philo System is Unlike All Other Ways of Keeping Poultry and in many respects just the reverse, accomplishing things in poultry work that have always been considered impossible, and getting unheard-of results that are hard to believe without seeing.

Two Pound Broilers in Eight Weeks are raised in a space of less than a square foot to the broiler without any loss, and the broilers are of the very best quality, bringing here three cents per pound above the highest market price.

Chicken Feed at 15 Cents a Bushel

Our book tells how to make the best green food with but little trouble and have a good supply, any day in the year, winter or summer. It is just as impossible to get a large egg yield without green food as it is to keep a cow without hay or fodder.

Our Six-Months-Old Pullets Are Laying at the Rate of 24 Eggs Each Per Month in a space of two square feet for each bird. No green cut bone of any description is fed, and the food used is inexpensive as compared with food others are using.

Our new book, the PHILO SYSTEM OF POULTRY KEEPING, gives full particulars regarding these wonderful discoveries, with simple, easy-to-understand directions that are right to the point, and 15 pages of illustrations showing all branches of the work from start to finish.

Don't Let the Chicks Die in the Shell

One of our secrets of success is to save all the chickens that are fully developed at hatching time, whether they can crack the shell or not. It is a simple trick and believed to be the secret of the ancient Egyptians and Chinese which enabled them to sell the chicks at 10 cents a dozen.

The New System Covers All Branches of the Work Necessary for Success from selecting the breeders to marketing the product. It tells how to get eggs that will hatch, how to hatch nearly every egg and how to raise nearly all the chicks hatched. It gives complete plans in detail how to make everything necessary to run the business and at less than half the cost required to handle the poultry business in any other manner.

Our New Brooder Saves 2 Cents on Each Chicken

No lamp required. No danger of chilling, overheating or burning up the chickens as with brooders using lamps or any kind of fire. They also keep all the lice off the chickens automatically or kill any that may be on them when placed in the brooder. Our book gives full plans and the right to make and use them. One can easily be made in an hour at a cost of 25 to 50 CENTS.

Carrying the Casket into the Metropolitan Temple

Dr. Klopsch Laid at Rest

A Great Assemblage at the Funeral Services in the Metropolitan Temple, New York=Paying the Last Sad Tributes

WHEN a good man passes away, the whole world is poorer for his going, yet infinitely richer for his having lived and through he noble example he leaves to others. The funeral f the late Dr. Louis Klopsch, editor and proprietor f this journal, took place on Wednesday, March 9, t 11 o'clock A.M., in the Metropolitan Temple, Sevnth Avenue and Fourteenth Street, New York ity, of which church he was a valued member. It as a remarkable funeral, worthy of the man. All lasses were represented in the large attendance hich filled the entire building, main floor and galries, and packed all the passages but the central isle, while many hundreds were gathered outside, here they remained during the entire service.

Within the Temple, one could note the mingling f the rich and poor, the prosperous business men and umble workers; the men f the Bowery, who had earned to know and love r. Klopsch through his hristlike work in the owery Mission, and the en of large enterprises, who knew his ability and is sterling worth in the orld of affairs. There, oo, were the children of he tenements, met to take last fond look at their ind benefactor, and to ing as an appropriate reuiem those sweet songs e had loved to hear them ing at the beautiful Chilren's Home which he ounded for them at Montawn on the Hudson. Ministers of many different denominations, too, ere there, who had been o-workers with him in any a godly enterprise or the spiritual and material uplift of humanity, and who looked up to him as a strong, confident leader in the Lord's vineyard. It was a gathering such as is rarely seen anywhere, and all were drawn by a common impulse to show their respect, honor and love for one whose life had been freely spent for others, and who had consecrated his great talents to the service of Christ and humanity.

The funeral service was set for 11 o'clock, but long before the doors of the Metropolitan Temple were thrown open the throngs began to gather in front of the building. It soon became evident that the seating capacity of the Temple would be wholly inadequate for the multitude. Not only from the city itself, but from suburban towns and many distant points, friends came to pay the last tribute to their beloved leader in many Christian enterprises.

The Temple was filled rapidly and every seat was occupied by half-past ten. Precisely at 11 A. M. the service began. The Rev. J. Wesley Hill, D.D., pastor of the Temple, led the procession up the centre aisle to the altar, reciting the service for the dead. He was accompanied by Rev. Ferdinand C. Iglehart, D.D.; Rev. Wallace MacMullen, D.D.; Rev. John Hallimond, D.D.; Rev. J. M. Buckley, D.D., and several others. Slowly they marched from the front of the church up the aisle to the solemn strains of the organ. Next came the honorary pall-bearers, as follows:

Rear-Admiral Charles D. Sigsbee, O. S. Marden, G. H. Sandison, J. A. Belford, Otto Koenig, P. R. Bromfield, D. A. Nesbit, J. McGee, Dr. F. Schavoir, R. D. Carter, John C. Earl, Charles Francis, S. A. Everitt, Arthur J. Little, William B. Howland, J. J. Little. Then came the bearers of the casket, and immediately behind it came the family of the deceased: Mrs. Klopsch, Louis Klopsch, Jr., Miss Mary Klopsch and Merritt Klopsch, all in deep mourning. The immediate relatives of the family brought up the rear. These included the venerable Rev. Stephen Merritt, Mrs. Merritt, Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert H. Crawford, Dr. Mary Crawford, Misses Charlotte and Caroline Crawford, Conrad Crawford, Mr. and Mrs. Morris Crawford, Miss Sarah Merritt and Stephen Merritt, Jr.

The casket was deposited in front of the platform, where it was surrounded by great fragrant banks of beautiful flowers. There were many magnificent floral pieces, the loving offerings of friends and associates. President Taft sent from the White House a superb floral wreath of large proportions, which was laid upon the casket. He also sent with this tribute the following letter:

"My Dear Mrs. Klopsch: I was greatly shocked to note in the newspapers of yesterday that your good husband passed away under the effect of the operation. I have not known him long, but I have known him long enough to know of the good that he has done, the charity that he has encouraged, and the gratitude that he is entitled to from the poor and the oppressed. I sincerely hope that the memory of all these things will sustain you in your grief. Very sincerely yours, Wm. H. Taft."

In the front of the east gallery were 250 children of the tenements, each of whom had been a little guest at Mont-Lawn during the last summer, and all of whom personally knew and dearly loved Dr. Klopsch. A large section of the auditorium was filled by employees of The Christian Herald. Sections were also reserved for societies of which Dr. Klopsch had been a member.

During the service there were many signs of deep emotion among the auditors and many were in tears. Rev. Dr. Hallimond's prayer was especially touching and thrilled the assemblage with its spiritual fervor and earnestness. The address by Dr. Buckley, which followed, closed with a tribute of esteem and admiration which was appreciated by all who heard it.

The Opening Prayer

Rev. Dr. Hill opened the service by invoking the divine presence and gracious blessing, in these words:

"O Thou, who art the 'shadow of a great rock in a weary land,' we come seeking the refuge of thy love and the shelter of thy wing. Thou, who hast said, 'Lo, I am with thee alway, even unto the end of the world,' reveal thyself unto us in the consolations of thy grace, the comfort of thy Spirit, and the inspiration of that hope 'which we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the veil, whither the Forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus Christ.' Amen."

The first musical selection was sung by a quartette composed of Mrs. Fugle, soprano; Mrs. Anna Simpson, contralto; Frederick Boynton, tenor; F. Servier, basso, under the direction of Mr. Charles J. Evans, musical director of the Temple. Mrs. Prue Baird served as the organist. The selection was "Abide With me."

Rev. Dr. F. C. Iglehart read Scripture selections from the twenty-third Psalm and the fourteenth chapter of John's Gospel. The children of the Mont-Lawn Home, in the gallery, sang with surprising and melting pathos "The Glory Song."

Dr. Hallimond's Supplication

Rev. Dr. Hallimond then offered prayer, as follows:

"O God, our Father, thou hast seen fit to send a great sorrow to our hearts. We cannot understand it. We stagger under the mystery of it. We ask thee to forgive us if we have shown any hesitation in accepting thy will, if we have manifested any rebellion of spirit, if any murmuring has momentarily escaped us, forgive us; and oh, help us, because the task is too hard for us in our poor, frail, faltering humanity. Help us to be still and murmur not, to breathe the prayer divinely taught, 'Thy will be done.' In thy strength, O God, we accept the decree. If it be thy will that we take the cup, even so, O Father. But, O God, notwithstanding the great weight, the great burden of sorrow which is resting upon us this morning, we cannot keep our hearts from rising in joy and exultation over the achievements of this wonderful life that has just been brought to a close. We praise thee, O God, for the many and the varied gifts that thou didst bestow upon thy servant; for his marvelous business acumen, for his tireless zeal, for his burning enthusiasm, for his patient industry, for the rare example he has afforded us of a man who was able to make money, and yet never thought of spending it in the pursuit of mere personal pleasure or indulgence.

"We praise thee, O God, for his wide and world-embracing charity. We thank thee for the virtue of being able to rise and take a broad and comprehensive view of the world's need. We thank thee for his almost unparalleled resourcefulness. We thank thee for his indomitable persistency of purpose. We thank thee for his steadfastness in the truth. We thank thee for the almost priceless lesson that he has been teaching the Christian community of this land during the last twenty years. We thank thee, O God, for the great charitable heart of his. We thank thee that, aided by thy wisdom and through the instrumentality of an undenominational journal, thou hast made it possible for him to gather together the scattered fragments, the units, and bind them in a great, united, happy family circle of Christian believers. We thank thee for the mighty inspiration his personality has been to millions of his fellow-creatures in all lands, from kings and princes and presidents down to the poor, homeless wanderers, outcasts, tramps in the Bowery, and the poor little, white-faced children in the tenements.

"We thank thee, O God, for all that has been accomplished in connection with that wonderful commission which thou didst place in his hands, of feeding the hungry multitude, so great, so vast, no other man has ever attempted it since Christ himself fed the five thousand in a desert place. We thank thee, we praise thee, that when, in the mysterious workings of thy providence, any country has been stricken with famine, or with flood, or with earthquake, or pestilence, that his heart instantly throbbed with a Christlike pity, and his hand was the first to be outstretched with the needed help. We thank thee, O God, for all these lessons. We thank thee for his comprehensive sympathy. We thank thee for all the spiritual results that have come to his life, for his triumphs in the various Sabbath Schools with which he has been connected for his noble and incessant care of these thousands of city children at Mont-Lawn for so many years. We thank thee for his readiness to give spiritual help when it has been needed. We thank thee for the thousands and tens of thousands that have been saved from the degradations of sin by his instrumentality. We thank thee for the thousands of homes that have been gladdened and strengthened by his personality, reflected on the pages of his paper.

"O God, thou knowest how thankful we are for this great life that has just been closed. And now we pray, dear heavenly Father, for those that are left behind. We pray earnestly and specially for his widow, this sweet and gracious woman, whose life has been swept by this desolating sorrow. We pray for these dear boys and this daughter in their bitter sorrow, realizing as they do that they have lost the best and stanchest friend. Wearing the chill of their bereavement, they cry out for 'the touch of that vanished hand and the sound of that voice that is still.' O God, wilt thou comfort them. Comfort them, Father, with thine own comfort, 'as one whom a mother comforteth.' Wilt thou comfort this woman and her fatherless children. We pray, as a congregation of Christian believers, that thou wilt bless and comfort and strengthen that devoted staff in The Christian Herald office, who are grieving as no staff ever grieved before, perhaps, for an employer who has gone, and who was just as much a brother and a friend. O God, bless them and help them.

From a photograph taken last summer

Dr. Klopsch and the Children at Mont-Lawn

The Waifs and the Orphans

"Do thou bless the thousands of little children in this great city this morning who are troubled, and who, in their childish sympathy, sorrow and wonderment, are asking, as they have been doing, 'Shall we never see his face again?' And bless the thousands of orphans in India and Japan and China who don't even yet know of the great loss that has come to them. Bless the poor men in the Bread Line to-night who, in addition to all their misery, have this thought: that they have lost their best friend, their benefactor. And we ask thee, O God, as a congregation, that thou wilt grant that those great charities of his, and the numberless small charities that he, aided by thy wisdom and strengthened by thy strength, was able to inaugurate and carry on for so many years—we pray that they may be carried on by other faithful souls, who are thus called to take his place. And now we pray for ourselves, that we may go from this service back to our God-given spheres of labor with increased devotion for that great cause to which he has given the last full measure of his devotion. We ask it in the name of our Redeemer. Amen."

The quartette sang "Lead, Kindly Light." Rev. Dr. Wallace MacMullen read the second Scriptural selection from the fifteenth chapter of I. Corinthians.

The voices of the children of the Mont-Lawn Home again rang out in a beautiful hymn, composed of Bible verses, a selection which was a peculiar favorite of Dr. Klopsch.

Rev. Dr. Buckley's Address

Rev. Dr. James M. Buckley, editor of the Christian Advocate, of New York, was the next speaker. He said:

"Our Lord Jesus was the most pitiful of all the preachers. He gave the most comprehensive of all the statements. And above them all he stood ready to teach angels as well as men. He pities us to-day. He knows that 'the spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak.' He knows that those who suffer most excruciatingly may take his prayer, 'Let this cup pass from me.' 'If it may pass from me, that would be my desire; but not my will, not my will, thy will.'

"President McKinley turned to his invalid wife as he was about to die, and said, as well as he could, 'Our ways are not God's ways, but God's ways are our ways, and we must make them our ways.' There were many paraphrases of that utterance, but that is the idea, and it stands from the beginning until now to all who have faith. Even a little faith in God will go a long distance toward steadying us.

THE WORLD MOURNS HIS LOSS

for 'weeping' and 'sorrow,' those who say the Christian ought not to weep or sorrow do not understand the Bible nor the human heart. Did Christ rebuke the sisters? Did not St. Paul himself say that God sent his friend Epaphroditas, lest he Paul, should have sorrow upon sorrow? Did not the Lord weep with the sisters?

Tears are for the earth, and for the Christian who can say, 'There is my son,' calmly looking into the dead face; for the man who can look upon his wife's face calmly, and say, 'That is God's will and it is my will,' there is no death in either heart. We are made so that we may weep rather than dash against the rocks or become absolutely devoid of reason.

When a poor man dies, his wife has lost her all. When the rich man dies, there are many things left of temporary comfort; but I have never known any difference between the sorrows of the poor and the sorrows of the rich, where the heart is involved—the same miseries, the same trembling, the same looking for a future, and not ready for it. But God makes every promise that the soul desires. The Sacred Book is like the contents of a medicine chest. One must not take anything out of the medicine chest at random. Each item fits the exact need at a certain time. And so, here we go through the Book, and we find a promise for every difficulty.

Comforting the Bereaved Ones

You will find no definite promise to comfort a man who has been bereaved of his wife in the Bible, from one end of it to the other; but where can you search without finding some great promise for the widow? The sublimest figure in all the Bible relates to the sorrows of the woman who had lost her husband; and the utterances 'I am the Father of the fatherless,' and 'I am the God of the widow' are given; and God even rises to this tremendous symbol, 'Thy Maker is thy husband.'

It is not necessary for us to recount in this presence all that our friend thought, all that he intended, all that he did. Long before we came to this last hour, the newspapers of the country had told of his achievements. We are here to sympathize; we are here to reflect upon the great principles of God, of immortality, of Christ, and of human life. Let us get a glance to-day, through faith, into the fact that God himself requires the whole universe to carry out his plan. No Christian dies accidentally. If he be thrown down before a car and crushed, in the thought of God it is not an accident. 'Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints.' All deaths could be postponed without a miracle. God has constantly a connection with our ideas—the constant stream of our ideas. If he saw best, without a miracle he could influence us in thought not to get under the wall when it is about to fall. By a mere movement of our faculties God might cause us to pass away. We must accept the old religion of the general providence of God. Who knows that this death will not awaken thousands to the consideration that they must prepare to die? Who knows it? There ought to be persons in this house to-day who have seen here the pallid features, the magazine of energy silent and cold. They should take it to their hearts that they will be as silent, as cold, as helpless, and that the time is unknown.

What caused this man to do these things? No doubt he was pleased with public approbation. Remember there is a marked difference between selfishness and self-love. We are not required by the Golden Rule to love our neighbor more than we love ourselves. We are to love our neighbor as we love ourselves. And he received the honors of his wonderful philanthropic and successful projects, and he had plenty of Scripture for that; for at the end of all the Epistles there is a list of saints and of the good things they have done. It is when a man works for himself exclusively that he is thrown out of heaven. But he loved God and his neighbor. All these things were a part of his religion. Some rejoice in riches, some in political honors, some in scholastic achievements. He preferred to get his highest honor through assisting those that were not so well off in the world as himself.

"Friends, there is a manifest contrast here. You never saw such a contrast. I never saw such a contrast. Every class and condition of humanity may be found here. This magnificent floral decoration on the casket was sent here by the President of the United States. Recognizing the great difficulty of genuine philanthropy, he finds genuine philanthropy in the heart of this man. And these two hundred children—descended from many nations—these two hundred children that have been singing to us here are the children of the poor. Here is fulfilled in this man's life the proverb three thousand years old. 'Seest thou a man diligent in his business? he shall not stand before mean men; he shall stand before kings.' The country comes up in the act of the President and says, 'Well done! Well done!'

"It is read at almost every service, 'Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord; for they shall rest from their labors, and their works do follow them.' It is beautiful. 'Their works do follow them.' Am I not right in saying that such has been the nature of this man's philanthropy that the immense number of his works have gone before him? It must be so, for they have included life and death.

"And now, what shall we say? Shall we say that there is a mistake? Suppose that he had lingered, as some philanthropists have, until they were so old and imbecile that they were forgotten! And here speaks with great force the value of a life. He was but little poorer, richer than some of the poorest, when he began. He made a life. He made a fortune. He made a great philanthropy of a peculiar kind. It is an honor to meet together in his honor. I shall miss him, but I did not postpone until his death to commend him. After a visit to his institution for the children, I described as well as I could what I saw, what I heard, and, best of all, what I felt. I hope to meet him where there is no disappointment, no heart-breaking surprises. I suggest to his children that the father of Noah, when Noah was born, said, 'These shall comfort us concerning our work and labor of love.'

"Passing one day a most imposing structure in this city devoted to religion, I turned in to hear the sermon, and the sermon was preached from this text to which I have just referred, and the eloquent preacher said, 'In order to carry out the spirit of the name, it is wise for sons and daughters to carry out, as far as possible, the plans of their parents and thus show confidence in them as respects their judgment and their love for them by manifesting it in such a manner.' And so I say to these sons and this daughter: always have a deep sympathy with your father's principles and spirit and works, and then each day to the last you will be a comfort to your mother and insure yourselves a final meeting where no sepulchral voice is heard.

"There are minor chords. There are major chords. These are minor chords, but as we go forth let us be so powerfully wrought upon by the virtues of a good and successful life that we may feel within our souls ringing 'Onward! Onward, Christian!'"

As a solo Mrs. Simpson sang "Crossing the Bar." Rev. Dr. Hill closed the regular service by pronouncing the benediction: "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God, and the comfort of the Holy Spirit be and abide with you now and evermore. Amen."

The Beautiful Masonic Service

Following the formal church service came the beautiful Masonic rite for the dead by members of the Evangelist Lodge, which was listened to with much feeling. The little group of his fellow-members surrounded the casket, and as the rite proceeded, they depositing on the casket their tiny sprays of evergreen, the token of immortality, a thrill went through the church. Past Master T. S. Roane officiated. Later, when the Scottish Rite was performed by another delegation of the Masonic Brotherhood, and a single, perfect white rose was laid upon the breast of the dead, every one felt the beautiful appropriateness of the symbol of a pure and upright life. The late Dr. Klopsch was a thirty-second degree Mason. Commander-in-Chief John Lloyd Thomas pronounced a beautiful eulogy.

After this rite had ended, the casket being still open, the congregation was permitted to take a last look at the face of the departed. Solemnly and silently the long line filed past, many lingering as they gazed with streaming eyes. Many wept as they looked upon the familiar lineaments, now lying so white and stately and still.

The little tenement children followed the adults in the line and gazed wonderingly and with tear-dimmed eyes upon the features of their benefactor. The pall-bearers, in their turn, filed past the casket, and last of all came the family. It was a painful moment and sobs could be heard throughout the church.

After the closing of the casket, the procession was re-formed, the pall-bearers leading. Slowly they came down the aisle to the mournful strains of the "Dead March." It seemed as if the very depths of sorrow and feeling had been touched. At the door, and far up and down the street, were the crowds who had been unable to obtain admittance. The casket was deposited in the hearse, and the family and immediate relatives entered the mourning coaches in waiting, after which the crowd slowly dispersed.

Among those present at the funeral were Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, "the Mother of the Bowery Mission"; Rev. Frank De Witt Talmage, Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, of Washington, D. C.; Rev. Daniel S. Gregory, D.D.; Rev. William James, Rev. George Sanderson, chaplain of the Tombs; Rev. Dr. J. M. Farrar, Rev. Dr. F. F. Shannon, Rev. Dr. W. J. Peck, Rev. G. S. Avery, Chester Crest; Alderman Caygill, of New York City; Colonel W. H. Cox and Colonel Margitts, of the Salvation Army; Rev. J. M. Conway, Florence Mission; Rev. John Callahan, Hadley Hall; Mr. J. H. Wyburn, Water Street Mission; Mr. Don Shelton, Mr. H. P. Main, Rev. W. T. Twamley, Rev. Franklin S. Babbitt, of Nyack, N. Y., and many other clergymen.

There was a large delegation of editors and publishers of the religious press of the country, and many men prominent in various lines of business who had been personally acquainted with

Easter Revelations

"They found"—St. Luke XXIV. 2

A Sermon by Rev. FREDERICK F. SHANNON, D.D.

"THEY found!" But Some One has made it possible for them to find. In behind their calamities, Some One has been working in silence. True, the brigands of hate and death have been abroad. Yet Some One has been moving noiselessly at the centres of being. Only yesterday all doors were shut in the faces of these love-tuned women. Only yesterday Calvary's crimson rain was falling from clouds of horror. Only yesterday Incarnate Love was slain and buried out of sight. But to-day! Ah, to-day is lighting up yesterday's blackness with celestial radiance! Those inky folds of unshot cloud-masses are already aflash with the splendor of fulfilled prophecies. Yesterday the skies seem to be wrought of unyielding iron. To-day they are melted down in love's flaming furnace. The fire of love in God's heart hath eaten through that universe of brass. Now the very heavens are weeping tears of joy. For earth is no longer a squalid alley, concealed among the back streets of the universe. Our redeemed planet swings to her place in God's chanting choir of harmonious worlds. "He is not here! He is risen!" From the lowest atom to the tallest angel that anthem rolls in billows of melody through the echoing spaces. The morning stars lost their song when sin's threnody began. But now Easter morning hath restored that lost chord. Once again the sons of God are shouting for joy. The Triune God—that all-glorious, three-flowered hope of the human heart—hath gotten unto himself a great victory. All hail! Death is dead. All hail! Christ is alive for evermore. Therefore:

Each angel sweeps his lyre,
And claps his wings of fire,
Thou Lamb once slain!

We are to think of "Easter Revelations" this morning. And we are to ponder and wonder with glad hearts. Never, I think, should we be more profoundly grateful for revelation than to-day. We must never depreciate the romance and heroism of discovery. That is one of the excellencies of our humanity. Discovery is human and glorious. But revelation is divine and spiritual, extra-human and eternal. I am aware that to-day we are fond of asking:

Who shall draw the mystic line
Severing rightly His from thine,
Which is human, which divine?

Confessedly, it is not always an easy problem to solve. Yet I am persuaded that the "mystic line," distinguishing the divine and the human, is quite definitely drawn in revealed religion. I accept "the higher pantheism." But I glory in "the higher theism," as manifested by God in the Easter Christ. I am glad that our Lord is truly human. But I am doubly glad that he is truly human and divine. Once he wore our humanity as its uncrowned king. Now he wears it as its God and Saviour. "And upon his head are many crowns."

The Unsealed Sepulchre

As you see, our text is short and simple. Yet it is also luminous and mighty. "They found!" Why, it is the golden key that opens the doors of the King's palace! And it will fit every unlocked door in the universe. Now, it is good to have such a key. It is splendid to behold the King's treasures within. But let us remember that the key, the palace, and the gems are all gifts of the King. They are Easter revelations of our risen Lord. What did those love-garmented women find on that first resurrection morn? Let us see:

I. They found an unsealed sepulchre. "And they found the stone rolled away from the tomb." How to remove that stone, you remember, was the problem of these dawn-women. At Pilate's command, the body of Jesus had been delivered to Joseph and Nicodemus. They wrapped it in a clean linen cloth. Then they placed it in Joseph's own new tomb. Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of Joses, sitting over against the tomb, had watched these two secret disciples roll a great stone up to its door. Moreover, the chief priests and Pharisees had asked Pilate to take special precautions that the sepulchre be made sure until the third day. Pilate curtly grants their request. "So they went, and made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone, and setting a watch." And next morning a small company of women, sweet with love and spices, are coming to anoint the Master's body. On the way they remember that great stone. Their love is white, and noble and strong. All heaven is agreed on that. But oh, their weak woman's hands! In their great love they had forgotten their fragile physical strength. "And they were saying among themselves, Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the tomb?" so unconscious were they that their problem had already been solved! "And looking up, they see the stone is rolled back!"

Our Journey to the Tomb

Easter, then, is God's pledge for unsealing the mysteries of life. They enshroud us on every hand. The earthward side of our lives may be described as an unbroken journey to sealed tombs. Some of us are journeying through the morning land of youth. Some of us are rushing through the noontide of prime. Some of us are on the summits of age. But all of us, young and old, rich and poor, learned and unlearned, saint and sinner, are constantly facing toward sealed mysteries. By the blessing of God, we have picked a few locks. We have solved a few problems. We have won a few secrets from nature. But, strangely enough, the more we win the more deeply are we impressed by those still unwon. We have to confess that, in large measure, the great problems are all ancient problems. Sin, for example, is not a twentieth century simulacrum. In our folly we may be disposed to treat it so. But sooner or later we discover that sin is no sham, no make-believe, no scare-crow posted in the fields of human life. It is black and bleak and deadly. Pain, also, refuses to be anodyned by a theory. In the last analysis, death is just as mysterious for us as for that first throbless heart. And these questions, I think, appear otherwise only so long as we are the victims of unworthy prepossessions. Once the veneer is stripped away, once the prejudice is mastered by fact, once the scales are fallen from our eyes, then do we see these things in their naked, unvarnished reality. Our sepulchre lies out there in the morning mist, not far away. Going thitherward, we say to each other: "Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the tomb?"

The Easter Light Breaking

Ah! it is just then that the Easter light transfigures our joyless gloom! For Easter whispers: "Look up, and on—not back, nor down! Good Friday's darkness is all agleam with Sunday morning's gold. Your tomb is there, but unsealed. One hath been there before you. Come, see the place where the Lord lay." Is not this the message which stirs the hearts of countless millions to-day? Without its deathless hope human life would be one vast sepulchre. But with its measureless power tugging at humanity's heart men are as dauntless as they are hopeful. In the blazing brilliance of the Easter dawn no defeat can be accepted as final. No despair can be regarded as permanent. No disease can be pronounced incurable. No mystery can be considered impenetrable. Neither sin, nor death, nor the grave can utterly discourage us. Nay, more: with the uprush of resurrection life in our own spirits we defy, we dare, we challenge our mightiest foes! And why? Because the life and wisdom of the risen Christ, surging with omnipotent power through risen lives, and claiming dominion over those as yet unrisen from the death of sin, cannot possibly fail! It is forever true that Subtlest thought shall fail and learning falter,

Churches change, forms perish, systems go,
But our human needs, they will not alter,
Christ no after age shall e'er outgrow.

Yea, Amen! O changeless One, thou only
Art life's guide and spiritual goal,
Thou the light across the dark vale lonely—
Thou the eternal haven of the soul!

O my friend, are you walking, midst blinding sorrow, toward a sealed tomb to-day? Have the enemies of your soul, like the enemies of your Lord, sepulchred your dearest hopes? Yea, have they made the tomb sure? Have they sealed the entrance-stone with the might of worldly authority? Have they set a strong watch of rationalism round about? Then, I beseech you, by the majesty and triumph of this Easter morn, look up! That seal on the entrance stone shall be broken! Those keepers shall become dead men in the lap of a divine earthquake! Go sunrise angel, "flashing lightning's light," and rob in raiment white as snow, shall roll away the sto and sit upon it! For the God who is able of sto to raise up children unto Abraham is our God. can turn tombstones into rocking chairs! Oh, let angel unseal your sepulchre to-day! With the fl of his eye he will smite the seal! With the mig of his hand he will toss the stone away! With breath of his mouth he will warm the stone's ch With the love of his heart he will upholster its fli hardness into soft and downy cushions of peace a rest! Thus, may you, too:

Sing with all the sons of glory,
Sing the resurrection song!
Death and sorrow, earth's dark story,
To the former days belong:
All around the clouds are breaking,
Soon the storms of time shall cease,
In God's likeness, man awaking,
Knows the everlasting peace.

II. They found an empty tomb. "And they tered in, and found not the body of the Lord Jesu Now, most tombs are dear to our humanity beca of what they contain. I go yonder to Grant's to on Riverside Drive. Why do I stand uncover Because I remember that the body of a patriot re there. I stand by the slab marking Livingsto grave in Westminster Abbey. Why the beat heart and the moistened eye? I remember that h lies as heroic dust as was ever organized int human body. I visit Beecher's and Talma graves in Greenwood. Why does their golden quence cry aloud from the ground? The place holy because their bodies are resting there. And it is with the graves of father, mother, sis brother, husband, wife, lover, friend, through the wide world. Their entombed dust hallows place of its entombment. We prize it for wha contains.

But one tomb hath imperishable glory because its emptiness. It is the tomb of Joseph. It is tomb visited by the Easter Marys. "They fou not the body of the Lord Jesus!" But their covery, mark you, is primarily God's revelat Consider this in its twofold significance.

The Meaning of the Resurrection

First, the empty tomb is a rock-ribbed, colo fact. It is this we are insisting upon to-d Christ's dead body came out of that tomb. It like and unlike the buried body. It was ident with, and yet different from, the body placed th in. Theories about it may come and go. But fact remains. Negations may rise up like drag teeth. But they soon destroy themselves. Spin could not believe in the empty tomb because it u his theory of the universe. "If you will only rec cile all philosophical difficulties concerning t empty grave," say some, "we will accept the fa But Sabatier thus disillusions these victimized th rists: "Men who would not admit the miracul would none the less decisively reject the witne And Sabatier is right. The victim of an iron-cl theory of the universe cannot see beyond his tiny intellectual mole-hill, much less beyond a de sealed sepulchre. Yet Strauss himself affirmed t the "origin of the disciples' faith is fully accou for if we look upon the resurrection of Jesus, as evangelists describe it, as an external miracul occurrence." And this is what Christendom do. It believes the empty tomb to be the miracul act of Almighty God. "We witnessed of God," Paul, "that he raised up Christ."

Second, the historic fact has given us our hist faith. And that faith, in its purity, is a conquer redeeming, comforting faith. Religio-philoso speculations are constantly changing. They f from Berlin to Boston. Then they flicker out candles. But the Christian faith, based upon horic fact, burns on in quenchless ndor. The hand that sparkles mid-ht with its golden flood of suns is t nail-pierced hand. The hand that his the sea in its hollow is the hand t t nestles the saint in its palm. A on-ridden woman said to me: "It ms that I began limping at the cdle. I reckon I will keep it up to t grave. But, by the grace of God, I ean to stop it on the other side." A she spoke there gathered over her fe a radiant cloud. And that cloud n burst into a rain of joyful tears. Tn the Christ within her seemed to tch the falling shower into a love-rnbow. Only the Easter revelation, wh its sovereign fact and august fth, can grow a comforting, inspir-i, redeeming joy like that! For the epty tomb is God's assurance that aes, crutches, hospitals and graves s ll be done away. God means to sp them all on the other side!

III. They found the Lord Jesus him-sf. "And behold, Jesus met them, s ing, All hail." Here is indeed the cwn of the Easter revelations. For t unsealed tomb and the empty tomb h e opened the way to this final "ma-jtic glory" of our faith. Ask Mary Mgdalene, ask Simon Peter, ask St. Jn, ask the two Emmaus disciples vat turned their sorrow into joy, t ir despair into hope, their defeat i o triumph, their death into life, and a make answer: "We have seen the L·d."

But," says some one, "they had an o ective view of Christ. I have had n such privilege. If I could only see al touch and handle him, my faith vuld be stronger." Are you alto-gher sure about that? And, thus shaking, do you realize what manner d spirit ye are of? Are you willing t stand, with Thomas, at the foot of t resurrection class? Now, I am gd Thomas stood there, refusing to g up, until the Teacher answered his estion. But my gladness is due not ne to what Thomas saw and heard. I'm also unspeakably glad because of vat you and I may hear and see and l ieve. Oh, it is ours to claim the latitude of the unseeing believer to-y: "Blessed are they that have not s n, and yet have believed!" It is the l rd himself who says it. By faith r blessedness may transcend the l ssedness of those who beheld him t ough eyes of flesh!

Believe me, my friends, the Lord sus himself is always meeting his l ers in life's way. They may be in t busy path of Christian service. ey may be in the charmed social cle. They may be in the glow of j 's golden zone. They may be in t slough of despond. They may be i the chill of doubt. They may even f low their dearest to God's acre. No matter what the crisis, no matter what t perplexity, no matter what the ap-rent defeat, it may ever be said of ristian disciples, because it is the epest truth of their being: "And, be-ld, Jesus met them, saying, All hail!" r, since his return to that glory ich he had with the Father from be-re the foundation of the world, our rd has been constantly coming "to ld the brows that from their dead look ." THE CHILDREN'S EASTER SUNDAY

By Rev. J. M. FARRAR, D.D.*

EASTER is a celebration of the resurrection of Christ. The day when we all are glad, and rejoice because Christ rose from the grave. He was dead, but now lives. Rejoice! Rejoice! Rejoice! When Christ was on earth he brought the dead back to life. Were they all grown people, who had spent a long life working for Christ? No, no, they were not all grown people. One was a little maid in her shroud, one was a young man in his coffin, and one was a man in his tomb. Children, young people and grown people, all are to rise from their graves. After Christ was crucified and buried he rose from the tomb. That made it sure that we will rise.

EASTER means that we are to have another life after this one. When you see the Easter flowers, and hear the Easter music, do you ever ask: "If a boy die, shall he live again?" "If a girl die, shall she live again?" God tells you "Yes," and he wants you to think "Yes." Have you done any thinking about it? Do not be afraid to think. Here is how Dick and Mary did some thinking. While looking for shells on the beach one morning, they found a dead bird. Some one had shot it. They looked at the feathered body curiously and pitifully. "Mary," said Dick, "when we die, we'll look like that. How does anybody know there's any more of us than of a bird?" "What a curious boy you are!" said Mary; "how should I know?" Dick picked up the dead bird, then caught sight of his teacher coming toward them. He ran to her with his question. "Well, Dick," said she, "suppose you had been shot, and were lying on the sands, and this bird had passed over you, would it have stopped to pity you, or wonder who shot you and if you had gone to heaven?" "I suppose not," said Dick. "Then there is something in you that can love and be sorry, and wonder and ask questions, that the bird does not have. That's the part of you that is not like the bird, and will live forever." Dick and Mary buried the bird in the sand, but they never forgot why they were different from the bird and more precious to Jesus because they had a spirit that would go to God.

I CAN almost hear you say, "If I die, how is it possible for me to live again?" In Child Garden I read a story in which you can find an answer to your question. One day, when Manette was visiting her grandpa, she found a great worm lying in the path. It was as long as her grandpa's forefinger, and was as big around as his thumb. It was a light green color, with queer, bright-colored knobs or bumps all over it. It was so ugly Manette was afraid of it; but her grandpa lifted it between two sticks and put it into a pasteboard box, with a piece of glass for a cover. He then carried it into an upper room, which was not much used. His little granddaughter wondered and asked questions. "The worm is sleepy, and so I have made it a bed, and by and by it will make itself a blanket," grandpa said. "Oh, grandpa, can it, really? How can a worm make a blanket?" "It weaves it, dearie, something as a spider weaves its web. It will take a good while; you must watch and be patient."

MANETTE went every day to look at the worm, and after what seemed to her a long time one day she saw some fine threads from the worm to the glass. Every day there were more threads, until at last Manette could not see the worm at all. "He has covered himself all up, grandpa. Is the blanket finished now?" she asked. "Yes, and now the worm will sleep all winter, and when he awakes in the spring I don't believe you will recognize him." When Manette's visit was over, her grandpa gave her the box, carefully done up in paper, and told her to lift the cover off when she reached home. So she did, and found the worm snugly wrapped in its odd bedclothes, fastened tight to the glass. Her mamma leaned the glass against the wall, above the mantel in the library, and there it stayed all winter, and Manette stood and looked at it just as we go and look at the grave of our loved ones.

BUT one day in the early spring a very wonderful thing happened. Manette was playing in the yard when her mamma called her. She ran into the library, and there on the edge of the mantel was the most beautiful, gorgeous, golden-yellow butterfly! "Oh, mamma," she whispered, "did it fly in through the window, do you think?" "No, dear; it crept out of its winter blanket." And then her mamma showed her the cocoon, as she called the blanket which the worm had made. There was a hole at one end, and out of that the ugly green worm, changed into a fairylike insect, had crept to spend its second summer floating in the air and sipping sweets from flowers. "It's just as grandpa told me," Manette said; "I never would have known it."

HOW much more beautiful was the butterfly than the worm! One crept along the earth and burrowed under the ground, the other walked on the flowers and floated in the air. It was the same worm that slept and woke. Slept as a worm and rose as a butterfly. We now live on earth, some day we are to live in heaven. Our word cemetery means a sleeping place. The children's Easter Sunday. Rejoice! Rejoice! Rejoice!

so beautiful as the place where she is going." Turning to her loved ones, she continued, "Children, going through the valley of shadows is like cutting a path through the grass and flowers. Oh," she shouted, in ecstasy, "I see a white city on a silver ocean!" Then the daughter, who related the history to me, said, "Mother, it is not death I fear, but the grave." "Ah, my daughter, never fear. The grave has lost its terror since Jesus has lain there. Never think of me as being put into the grave. When my body is being lowered into the tomb, I will be looking on."

Surely this is the triumphant Easter Gospel. The grave, and everything connected with the grave—sin, death and hell—all have lost their terror since Christ Jesus burst asunder the iron gates of the tomb! O Christian, fight on, toil on, pray on, hope on! "They found!" And you, too, shall find! Continue to ask, and seek, and knock! All sepulchres shall be unsealed, all tombs shall be emptied, and that same Jesus who hath so often met you here shall meet and greet you in Yonderland! With all saints, let us join in the universal acclaim:

Lion of Judah, hail!
And let thy name prevail
From age to age:
Lord of the rolling years,
Claim for thine own the spheres,
For thou hast bought with tears
Thy heritage.

Paper and Premiums Appreciated

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Having been a subscriber to your paper from its start, some of the volumes I have bound and put in my library cases. To my mind there is not a better religious paper published. I am always anxious for its weekly visits, and greatly helped and benefited by what it contains. Your premiums each year are simply great; those received this year far ahead of any previously given. My prayer is that your subscription list for 1910 may be doubled and that great prosperity may come to you personally, with God's richest blessings.

The Vacant Chair

THE last rites have been said, the last tribute spoken, and the great family of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is in mourning for the loss of one whose strong personality, genial presence and boundless generosity have made a deep impression on this nation and the world.

It is not too much to say that, in the death of Louis Klopsch, the poor and suffering all around the globe are bereaved. He was not one who lived for himself; he spent his life freely for others. Wherever duty called he was ready to go, even to the ends of the earth. Many times he served amid scenes of danger and disease, exposed to the cholera in Russian famine camps, the deadly typhus in the hospitals of India, or the freezing blasts of winter in Finland. He did nothing by halves; whatever the work, he flung himself into it, not recklessly, but with the sublime confidence that he was under the divine protection and that God would see him through. It was this supreme trust in God's loving care that enabled him to overcome all difficulties. Obstacles only nerved him to greater effort. Was it a journey by land or sea, to save the helpless? He was ready, even at the midnight hour. Was money needed immediately for an urgent call? He did not hesitate to meet the need, however large, from his own personal funds, knowing that he would have the loyal support of God's people as soon as they knew what was at stake. And this grand faith never failed him, for right loyally did they rally at the call to service. He was the leader of a great army of consecrated men and women who, because they believed in him and trusted him, were enabled to make what seemed to be the impossible come to pass. It is a glorious record which these twenty years of service have rolled up: thousands of lives saved and helped in China, India, Africa, Finland, Russia, Armenia, and in many of our own States; thousands more brought into the Gospel fold through the direct influence of these world-wide humanitarian efforts, and still other thousands led to a closer union with and a deeper devotion to the Master through being personally associated with such a leader.

Tireless in planning, incessant in activity, ungrudging in ministration, he could not help wearing out. He was not one who could ever grow old; but as the sword wears the sheath, so the spirit of this man wore the physical frame which clothed it. In the meridian of his years, the fulness of his powers, he has left us, and the vacant chair in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office is a pathetic sign of the heartache his associates feel.

It has pleased God to summon him to higher service. The coronation of his life is not here, but over yonder. But we who are bereaved cannot but lament that we shall see his face here no more. The vacant chair is eloquent of our loss.

A Whole Bible

ONE of the most striking cartoons in recent years, apropos of the attacks on the Bible, represents a church member visiting his pastor and laying down for his inspection what seems to be a much-mutilated copy of the Scriptures. The pastor looks at him in mild surprise, and then takes up the Book and regards it with amazement. "Why," he says, "there is nothing here but the covers." "Well," says his parishioner, "that is all you've left of the old Book. First, you began by casting doubt on the Creation, and I tore that out; then Moses was a myth, and out went the Pentateuch. You told us the books that came next were simply Jewish history and folklore and fable—at least, so you said—and out they went, too; and so on with the prophecies, and when you got to the Gospels you threw so much doubt on them that they went with the rest. Now, there's nothing left but the boards, and I want to ask what you are going to do about them?"

We commend this little story to the consideration of writers who, like the authors of Religion and Miracle and similar books, are engaged in foolishly pulling out the leaves of the old Bible piecemeal. They vary in their methods of attack. Some advance the subtle suggestion that it is "a matter of indifference" what one's beliefs are; others point out that a belief in miracles is "not an essential part of Christianity," and that miracles are merely legends or fables, anyway. Still others, like Professor Drews, of Karlsruhe, deny the existence of Christ, and like Professor Haeckel, of Jena University, assert that the irresistible impact of science has already demolished the Scriptures. It is probably of very little consequence what these men say or write. Drews has been shown to have overlooked the most important evidence in connection with his subject, and Haeckel has been denounced by thirty-seven university professors as an "unreliable savant and a user of false methods." These assailants of what Gladstone called "the impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture" make a loud noise for the moment; but the rock remains fast and immovable.

Mr. Rockefeller's Gift

IT is a blessed thing that there can be no monopoly in well-doing. In the field of Christian service and public philanthropy there is room enough for a thousand times the number of practical workers the world has ever known. Hence, the welcome accorded to Mr. John D. Rockefeller, the richest man in America, in his new role of national philanthropist is genuine and enthusiastic. He has been one of the most widely criticised of men, and it is not improbable that some of the criticisms have been justifiable. It is certain, however, that most of them have been gratuitous. Now, it is made clear that the old man has been striving all these years to live up to an ideal, which has not been a mercenary one, as many have believed. His announced purpose of devoting practically the whole of his vast wealth—the largest single fortune of any man—to the cause of education and philanthropy comes as a pleasant surprise to the whole nation.

We congratulate Mr. Rockefeller on his decision to put his accumulated millions out to public service. He could not devote them to a nobler purpose. It is surely a fine thing to see a man who has fought through the whole of life's battle, so strenuously and so successfully from a worldly point of view, acknowledging at last the worthlessness of wealth for itself alone and recognizing that the possession of money cannot bring happiness, nor even satisfaction, unless it be employed in some way for the glory of God and the good of humanity.

The Call of the Day

DEEP down in the heart of almost every man there is some religious sentiment which, though it may have lain uncultivated in the mad rush for money and place, nevertheless still continues to live, and ready to be awakened often when the man himself least expects it. If one ventured to address him on some spiritual topic, to interest him in some vital truth connected with the fuller and better life in store for the followers of Christ, he would, perhaps, inform the speaker that he was not interested in religion, even though he had respect for Christ's teachings and for those who were trying to live up to them.

Without a spoken word from any one, the influence of Easter Day has great power over a large majority of this Army of the Indifferent. Some say that they go to church this one Sunday of the year to see the flowers, to listen to the music of choir and organ, but deep in the heart there is another reason, unconfessed. It is Easter, the anniversary of the day when Christ rose from the dead to give hope to a world which before his coming had had but little. The busy man of the world, despite his many interests and feeling of command over every-day matters, has not been able to escape the lot of other people. He, too, somewhere back in his boyhood home, has a green plot in a quiet country churchyard, holding some one who was dearer to him than his own life, his wealth, his dreams of power; and on Easter morning the sound of the bells ringing out joyfully the message to the world, "He has risen," brings back to him the sound of other bells, and, with a little fulness in the throat, a little momentary moisture in the eyes, he makes his way once more to his Father's house, to sit with Christian people, and he joins once more in hymn and prayer. He, like thousands of the Army of the Indifferent, has heard the call of the day.

TO OUR READERS

I CAN never adequately thank the readers of T CHRISTIAN HERALD for the many expressions f sincere and kindly sympathy which they have s during the days just past. These have been a sou of much needed consolation and spiritual encoura ment, and an unfailing comfort and aid in this h of trial. Yet it is not alone to thank you tha address the members of the great CHRISTIAN HER family for the first time. Now that the head of t family has been called to his reward, the quest naturally arises as to the continuance of his gr life-work in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and the p petuation of his charities. It is my privilege state that, while my father lay upon his last si bed, he confided to me that his paramount desire v that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should remain true the standards which have governed its course dur the last twenty years. In his lifetime he h stamped these principles upon it indelibly; and expressed desire that they be continued shall faithfully carried out. By long association w him and his methods, the staff of THE CHRISTI HERALD is fully able to continue the great work began and at which he labored successfully for many years.

I want to assure the members of the great CHR TIAN HERALD family that, although the voice of father is forever hushed, his spirit shall always p vade the activities of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a the great charities he organized shall live and perpetuated as fitting memorials of his life.

This, of course, with your help; for I shall c upon you from time to time for your aid, your operation, your good counsel. With the assura of this friendly support, we may be confident t Dr. Klopsch's great work, under God's blessing, w go on through the coming years, as a lasti memorial of his labors in the cause of Christ a humanity.

THE BIBLE AND NEWSPAPER

Conducted by FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

Streets of Cairo

THE streets of Cairo are singularly busy now. The aviation meeting has called numbers of people from all parts of the world. It is the fashionable season for the people of Europe and America in Egypt, and the important city of the East is full of native inhabitants, with manners and customs of four thousand years ago. Cairo is the largest city in Africa, and next to Constantinople is the largest under the Mohammedan rule. It is twice the size of Alexandria, and a more beautiful city. There are four hundred mosques in Cairo, one of which—the one within the citadel—is of pure alabaster. Its floor is covered with costly Oriental rugs and its dome surpasses in beauty any dome in the world, with the exception of St. Peter's. The largest of these mosques, El Azhur, has been converted into a Moslem university, which has two hundred and fifty teachers and over seven thousand students. Society people of Europe and America think very much of the Mediterranean trip, and find the healthy climate and beautiful scenery and the accommodations for the entertainment of guests all that could be desired. The city has one of the best hotels in the world. An imaginary line only separates the East from the West in the streets of Cairo, the civilization of four thousand years ago from that of to-day. Native women veil from head to foot, save for their eyes; quaint Arab types, mounted on camels or donkeys, or on foot, jostle against the elegantly dressed visitors from Paris, Berlin, London, New York, and other cities, and automobiles of largest type make the old camels and their drivers step lively out of the way with an alacrity quite new to the leisurely ways of the East; but the thing that will wake Cairo up most will be the visit of President Roosevelt, whose wife and daughter will meet him at Khartoum on his return from his hunting trip and be with him in the city of Cairo. There will be Biblical associations connected with the celebration of the Easter festival by Christians in the city of Cairo. It will be remembered that Egypt sheltered the Christ-child from the murderous Herod and gave him back to his native land, to his ministry of love and to his victory over death and the grave, fulfilling the words of the prophet:

Out of Egypt have I called my Son. (Matt. 2:15.)

The Picturesque Streets of Cairo, Where All Nations Meet

A Tramp Rewarded

Colonel Samuel Jennings is the owner of the Valdere cattle ranch in Texas, embracing 25,000 acres and supporting from 25,000 to 30,000 head of cattle. He has an interest in several other ranches. His little seven-year-old daughter, Evelyn, the apple of his eye, had ridden to Alpine on an errand for her father, on her favorite pony Pinky, and was crossing the railroad track to the place where she had hitched her pony when a freight train bore down upon her. As she saw the locomotive almost upon her she became panic-stricken and would have been crushed had it not been for a tramp, who jumped from behind a car in an instant and, seizing the girl, carried her off the track, just in time to save her. The tramp, thinking nothing of his heroic deed, slipped between two freight cars to steal a ride to El Paso. Colonel Jennings, learning of the rescue, set out to find the tramp who had effected it, and it was with some difficulty that he found him several stations away and had him brought back to Alpine. At the depot the colonel and his daughter met the man, whose name was Frank L. Strome, and invited him to be their guest at Valdere. Five days later Strome was presented with a document which upon reading he discovered to be a deed to a half interest in the Valdere ranch, estimated to be worth a million dollars. Strome was of good family, and a college graduate; but his friends had died, he had had bad luck in business, he had attempted to drown his troubles in drink and soon joined the army of "down-and-outs," and wandered aimlessly about. But he had underneath the rags and the bloat the spark of love which the occasion fanned into a flame, and which prompted the heroism so generously rewarded. Earthly heroism seldom meets with a material reward. In fact, genuine heroism does not take into account any reward, but those who work for the spiritual interest of others, who rescue their fellows from the spiritual dangers that threaten them, shall have a reward beyond human calculation or description.

They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever. (Dan. 12:3.)

Peat for Fuel

There has been murderous waste in the wood and coal supply in this country, and forests have been replanted and greater economy in the use of coal has been demanded. It looks now as though the experiments with bog peat, by experts of the United States Geological Survey, would reveal a new fuel, produced in the marshes of the country, to take the place of the disappearing coal supply. Peat in Europe is employed in producing light, heat and power of all kinds. Its use in America has not been counted practical or necessary. The deposits of peat in this country are enormous, and on a basis of $3 a ton are said to have a value of more than $30,000,000,000, a greater sum than is represented by all the property, stock, implements and buildings owned by the farmers of the United States. Observation has shown that the bogs containing peat are generally situated far from the coal fields. The States containing the greatest deposits are the Eastern Dakotas, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, Indiana, Ohio, New York, the New England States, New Jersey, portions of Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia and Florida. The by-products of peat of great value include coke, illuminating oils, lubricating oils, paraffin wax, phenol, asphalt, wood alcohol, ammonium sulphate and combustible gases of good fuel value. God has been prodigal in providing the material resources of our land, and his children have been keen and industrious in discovering and utilizing those energies. The discovery of the peat bogs, with their untold value, is another evidence of the generosity of God's dealing with us as a nation and his determination that we shall have a potential part in the physical, intellectual, moral and spiritual progress of this world. How righteousness becometh a nation so honored and a people thus blessed!

He hath not dealt so with any nation. (Ps. 147:20.)

Turned to Stone

John O'Neil, an engineer on the Southern Railway, while hunting in a dense forest near Manassas, Va., a short time ago, found a petrified dog in the forks of a tree, near the ground. The supposition is that the dog in springing for some kind of an animal was caught, and afterward turned to stone. O'Neil took the dog to Washington for exhibition. The petrifaction of an animal is an unusual occurrence in science. The turning of the heart to stone by selfishness and sin often occurs in the religious realm. The petrified dog cannot be made alive again. The heart of stone can. The resurrected Saviour can touch it with his finger, and it will pulsate with life and throb with joy and love.

A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you: and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you a heart of flesh. (Ezek. 36:26.)

Church Debt Lifted

There was rejoicing among the officers of the Holy Trinity Protestant Episcopal Church of Harlem over the fact that $35,000 had been laid upon the collection plate as a thank offering, and that with this money the mortgage that had burdened the congregation was lifted. When the Rev. Dr. Harry F. Nichols became rector of this church, ten years ago, it had a debt of $150,000 upon a church property valued at $225,000. By degrees the incumbrance had been reduced to $35,000. Fifteen members of the congregation decided to raise this amount and worked secretly, with success, and concealed their intention until the Thanksgiving service, when they laid the amount, as a surprise, on the collection plate. When the offertory plates were placed before the pastor he took from one a roll of paper, tied with a red string, held it before the congregation and said, "This is what has troubled us so long. It is the mortgage, and it has been canceled." The ease with which churches fall into debt, and the difficulty encountered in getting out of it, have been one of the weaknesses, if not sins, of our modern church life. Dr. Holland said truly: "There is too little religion in business, and too little business in religion." Fortunately, there is a business quickening, and moral awakening, as to the damage of a church debt to the spiritual work of the charge, and there is a determination in many States, cities and villages to get rid of old debts and be very cautious about making new ones. It becomes the church to have as high a standard of integrity as is expected of the individual Christian. The widow told the prophet Elisha how debt had distressed and was about to destroy her, and when he had miraculously increased the supply of oil his first instruction to her was to go and pay her debt, and live comfortably on what was left.

Then she came and told the man of God. And he said, Go, sell the oil, and pay thy debt, and live thou and thy children of the rest. (II. Kings 4:7.)

No Death There

The Stony Wold workers have had an unusually successful year in their fight against tuberculosis in its earlier stage. The sanitarium which cares for working girls and children having incipient cases of the white plague had the highest percentage of cures last year of any in its history, seventy-one per cent. of cases among adults being discharged apparently cured and seventy-five per cent. of the children. There were no deaths in the institution during the year. Reports were read from many who had been taken out of their invalidism to earn a living for themselves. What a record! Not a single death among those, almost every one of whom would have perished if their cases had not been taken in time. No language can describe the blessing of such institutions, which rescue many from death. There can be no fatal malady to those who are in Christ's spiritual church, whose Founder died that we might live, and by his resurrection abolished death for both worlds. When the chief, the moral hero, drops out of the ranks, when the beautiful spirit of our loved friend slips away from us in a night, we are comforted with this blessed truth. In a description of that world without a death, Christ comforted his disciples with the reason for their immortality.

Because I live, ye shall live also. (John 14:19.)

FANNY CROSBY'S NINETIETH BIRTHDAY

Our Sweetest Hymn Writer and Her Long Life of Beautiful Christian Service

FANNY CROSBY, the blind poetess, whose beautiful hymns are well known to readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD throughout the world, was born on the 24th of March, ninety years ago, in a one-story cottage in Southeast, Putnam County, N. Y. When about six weeks old she lost her sight through some unwise treatment of the eyes. Before she was a year old her father died. Her mother was a brave soul, coming from the oak-like natures of those who fought and died to give us what we now enjoy. Her duty now was to her child, and she did it in the fear of God.

In those days of childhood, Fanny's grandmother took a special liking to the child and did her best to show her the beauty of nature and the love of God as manifest in Christ. At the close of day, this gentle woman would rock the child in her old armchair, singing some sweet cradle-song; then, both kneeling down, would say an evening prayer and retire in the keeping of Him who never slumbers:

When Fanny was four years of age, the family moved to Salem, Westchester County, N. Y. Five years were spent here that were of much value to the child, for she was brought into close touch with the Friends, who showed her no little kindness. At Salem she made up her mind to be contented with her lot in life, and set to work to make the best of it, and wrote, when eight years of age:

> How many blessings I enjoy
> That other people don't!
> To weep and sigh because I'm blind,
> I cannot, and I won't.

When Fanny was nine, they took up their abode at Ridgefield, Conn. Six quiet years were spent there, in love with friends, flowers, birds and brooks. Nature was her school. She was now fifteen, and the door opened in the Institution of the Blind in New York City. Here she began her real work of life. She knew the habit of work was the way to the crown that was fadeless. In her student days she took much pleasure in reading the Bible. It was to her young life the Book of books. Before she was twenty, she was able to repeat chapter after chapter and book after book.

In the institution, Fanny's poetic gift was put to good use, for when some noted person (such as the President of the country, or some foreign notable) visited the home for the blind this young poetess was called upon to recite an original poem. Then she was taken, with others, from place to place, to show what the blind were capable of doing. In June, 1843, the Senate of the State of New York visited the institute, and Fanny, with one of her poems, made a deep impression upon the hearts of those men. She was taken to Washington, and recited before the two Houses of Congress, and appealed to them:

> O ye, who here from every State convene,
> Illustrious band! may we not hope the scene
> You now behold will prove to every mind
> Instruction hath a ray to cheer the blind?

Fanny Crosby, America's Best Loved Hymn Writer

When the blind girl was twenty years of age, a young man of rare musical skill came to the institution, and it happened they fell in love with each other and after many years Van, the blind musician, took Fanny, the blind poetess, to wife. About eight years ago he went to the "house of many mansions"; while Fanny still re mains, to sing songs of comfort to th downcast.

Fanny Crosby has not only sun hymns from her soul to other soul but she has been a faithful worker i the Church of God. She has a speci love for railroad men, for to he they were faithful in much danger and she has talked to thousands c these brave men throughout the cou try. In Young Men's Christian Asso ciations she has done much to impres young men with the manliness of liv ing the Christ-life.

Her great delight used to be to vis the missions of New York, and plea with the fallen to turn from the weakness to the strong arm of Go One night she went from a missio late, so impressed with the thoug that more must be done to save th souls who were "down and out." Tha night she was unable to sleep. Wall ing up and down the room, she saw th outcast, the perishing, the dying, an under this deep feeling she wrote or of the best known Christian hymn "Rescue the Perishing." Mr. Mood was fond of it and often spoke of it usefulness in his meetings. It was th favorite of Frances E. Willard and Francis Murphy in temperance wor

Mr. Sankey tells this story: " man in Sussex, England, gives th testimony: 'I believe I can attribut my conversion to one verse of that pr cious hymn, "Rescue the Perishing I was far away, far away, from m Saviour, and living without hope i Jesus. I was very fond of singin hymns, and one day I came across th beautiful piece, and when I had sun the words:

> Touched by a loving heart, wakened by kindnes
> Chords that were broken will vibrate once mor

I fell upon my knees, and gave m heart to the Lord Jesus Christ. Fro that hour I have followed him wh through this verse, touched my hea and made it vibrate with his prais ever since.'"

Fanny Crosby is living at the pre ent time with her friends in Bridg port, Conn. About once a year sh visits her intimate friends. She the sunshine of those homes. She ea well, sleeps well, talks well, lives we and all is well with our sweet sing at ninety; for she is only waiting th King's orders to continue a litt longer here, before going home to th house of many mansions.

AVALANCHES IN THE NORTHWEST

FAR up toward the summit of the Selkirks, those stupendous mountains which thrill the traveler as he comes within sight of their towering peaks while riding westward on the Canadian Pacific Railway, there has been heard again the roar and thunder of an avalanche. It broke from its rocky anchorage and swept down over a snowshed near Rogers Pass, burying about eighty men. The majority of those entombed in the snow were white men, the others were Japanese. They were, for the most part, section hands and trainmen.

Some of the men were working through a drift on one of the great snow plains when, without a moment's warning, the whole work-train was buried beneath tons of snow and ice.

The terrible catastrophe was seen by some trainmen, who sent word to the nearest town for physicians and a relief train.

Path of the Avalanche at Mace, Idaho

At Everett, Wash., two pas senger trains of the Great Northern Railway were ove whelmed by an avalanche o March 2, and about forty pe ple killed and many badly in jured. The trains were swep from the tracks into a dee gorge, one hundred and fift feet below. Doctors and nurse made their way on snowsho to the scene of the wreck. R lief trains were sent from bot directions, but were impede by other snowslides.

On this page is given one o the first pictures taken of th work of the avalanche at Mac Idaho, which did much damag and caused such loss of life. occurred on the night of Febr ary 27. The house in the pi ture was cut in two. A man i one part of it was instantl killed, while his wife, at th other end of the building, wa unhurt.

A SONG BY THE SEA

A STORY OF THE EASTERTIDE—BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE place was a little fishing hamlet on the New England coast, never mind where. Not many people lived there all the year round, although in summer there was a contingent of city visitors, most of whom had some association with the village in their childhood. Once in a while one of the large houses on the bluff would be opened in the winter or spring for the assembling of a house party, and this was the case to a marked degree on a certain Easter week a few years ago. No less than four of the usually tightly-shuttered mansions were occupied that year, and the presence of so many outsiders made a marked difference in the quiet hamlet. Business was brisk along the shore, and the plain little church, which had its handful of devout worshipers the year round, was thronged on Good Friday and Easter Sunday.

A lady and gentleman of middle age, who yet seemed rather to be lovers than husband and wife, were strolling along the beach early on Saturday morning when they suddenly stopped, arrested by the sound of a clear young voice singing a familiar hymn:

Rise, my soul, and stretch thy wings,
Thy better portion trace;
Rise from transitory things,
Toward heaven, thy native place.
Sun and moon and stars decay,
Time shall soon this earth remove;
Rise, my soul, and haste away
To seats prepared above.

The singer was invisible. The voice at first came from a distance, but presently drew near. It was a strong, sweet, silvery soprano, quite untrained, but full of melody, and it seemed to the listeners like the song of the lark as it soars away to the blue of the sky. "I wonder who it can be?" said the lady. "No one that we know among the people who came from town the other day has a voice to compare with this one. Ethel Dane sings finely and has had every advantage of training, but her voice is thin compared with that which we are hearing now."

Still invisible, the voice caught and held their attention. This time the song was so distinctly of Easter that the listeners felt sure it must belong to a member of the village choir, and that they should hear it in church the next morning. As if in a rapture of delight there floated to them on the morning wind the triumphant strain:

The day of resurrection!
Earth, tell it out abroad;
The Passover of gladness;
The Passover of God.

As the last sound ceased the singer came into sight, a slender, erect figure, walking among the sand dunes and looking as if she were the very spirit of the sunshine that made rainbows of the foam. She was obviously a mere slip of wholesome girlhood, not yet rounded into the amplitude of maturity. "Herbert," said the lady, "that child cannot be seventeen. She has a future before her, with that marvelous voice. I have been wondering what you and I could find to do by way of making a thank offering for the happiness we have found at last, after our long separation. I shall not need to wonder after hearing her in church tomorrow. We must rescue her from obscurity, give her the finest musical education Italy can provide, and then see that she has the opportunity to sing where the world can be at her feet."

The man smiled indulgently. "You are the same hopeful, enthusiastic woman that you were twenty years ago," he said, "not changed even a little bit. You hear a girl sing, you lose your heart to her, and straightway you are ready to risk time, trouble and a lot of money that she may have the chance of developing her gift. Well, darling, I love you all the more for the enthusiasm, and as we are to be married next week we'll look into this matter together, and if there are not too many obstacles in the way we'll carry out all your wishes. We owe something to the good God for bringing us together, and surely Eastertide is the best time in the whole year for making a thank-offering."

Mary Elmore and Herbert Ainslie had been betrothed sweethearts in their school days. A series of events beyond their control had prevented their marriage at the time it would naturally have occurred. For her there had been years of devoted watching over invalids, whom she could not leave. One by one they had gone to the heavenly world until she was at last left alone. Over and over Herbert had urged his suit, wishing to share her cares and halve her burdens, but there had always been opposition on the part of her nearest of kin, and therefore the man who loved her had waited until his hair was thin at the temples and gray instead of brown. Both were possessed of wealth, and they had planned a trip abroad to spend their honeymoon. Girls and boys might smile at their middle-aged happiness, but it is doubtful whether any youthful lovers tasted a sweeter cup than theirs in that Eastertide. As they sauntered on, loitering along the dunes and watching the waves as they rolled higher and higher, falling asleep in white foam on the sands, they again talked of the girl whom they had heard, and concluded that they would call at the house which they had seen her enter. Knocking at the door, they were made welcome in a simple, homely living-room, where an old man sat mending nets. A pleasant-faced woman, with mother written in every line of her matronly form and shining from her countenance, was sitting opposite him with sewing in her hands. The girl whom they had heard singing was standing by a table, with sleeves rolled above her elbows, washing the breakfast dishes, that had been piled up awaiting her return from her walk on the shore. As the visitors came in the girl was saying to her grandfather, "How can you sit there so patiently fussing over those nets? Outdoors the world is like a rose in bloom; the sea and the sand, and the bird flying above my head, all seem to me to be telling me to sing. I shall never sing as those girls do who come here from the cities, where they can hear great music and have good masters; but, after all, the sea is my teacher, and I have mother and you. Sometimes I want more, not always." All that the visitors heard of this little speech was the latter part, but the lady, glancing into the beautiful, wistful face, knew how to interpret it and did so. She went straight to the girl's mother. "I do not know you," she said, "but my friend, Herbert Ainslie, says that you know him, and that the old captain here—Captain Will, he calls him—first taught him how to sail a boat. I have come to make a request of you. May I see you in another room by yourself?"

The two women went upstairs together, and stepped into Betty Haskell's little white room. There they sat down, and there Miss Elmore told of her coming marriage and asked that she might be permitted to take Betty in charge and give her a musical education.

The practical mother at once agreed, providing that Betty should first have a year's instruction in the nearest large city, and that those who understood about it should agree that her voice was worth cultivating. "I would not want you and Mr. Ainslie to waste your money," she said, "and I know what disappointments there are in voices. I had one myself, but I never sang again after Betty's father was drowned. The child sings like a bird, and it would make her very, very happy if she could one of these days sing to a house full of people. She sings in church now," the mother added, with a proud smile.

In the meantime, the old captain and Herbert Ainslie were renewing their acquaintance. The old gentleman knew only good of Mr. Ainslie, and remembered his family before him. There was no difficulty in arranging whatever was best for Betty. She had shyly slipped out of doors again when her mother and Miss Elmore left the room. As the visitors came out of the house she stepped forward to say goodby to them, but they told her that they would see her again and that they wished her to come to the house where Miss Elmore was staying, and sing with a friend of theirs on Sunday evening.

"Ethel will be a good friend to Betty, if she is once interested in her as a possible prima donna of the future." Herbert threw back his head and laughed. Yet the day came when little Betty, daughter of the fisherman's cottage, child of nature, learning her first songs from the rhythmic waves and the chanting winds, sang to vast audiences and was greeted by their thunders of applause. She remained sweet and unspoiled, and often as the hallowed Eastertide returned, wherever she was, she lifted her pure young voice in the triumphant strain she had loved when she sang:

The day of resurrection!
Earth, tell it out abroad;
The Passover of gladness,
The Passover of God.

After her grandfather died, her mother closed the little cottage and went everywhere with Betty, but summer after summer there would always be a season when they came back to the quiet little hamlet on the coast, and lived for a while in the sweet simplicity and wholesome enjoyment of their unforgotten life by the sea.

Paper Full of Good Things

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a paper of which I look forward to every week. It is full of good things, and I think it does a great deal of good. The time—a work blessed of God.

New York Business Men Hear an Eloquent Tribute to Dr. Klopsch's Memory

ON Monday, March 7, at 1 o'clock, just twelve hours after Dr. Louis Klopsch had passed away, a large audience of business men assembled in the open air at Wall and Nassau Streets, New York, and listened with deep attention to an address by the Rev. William Wilkinson of Trinity church, who has been preaching there daily during the Lenten season. It was such an audience as could be gathered nowhere else in America. Bankers, brokers, clerks, merchants, importers, and men of all sorts of callings known to the downtown district were in the assemblage. Pastor Wilkinson, after the opening exercises, spoke as follows:

"I turn aside from my usual line of subjects to pay my tribute of love and honor to a princely man, who in this city has left his work on earth to take it up where Jesus Christ his Saviour and Master has appointed. Turn to Proverbs 10:28, 29—'The hope of the righteous shall be gladness: the way of the Lord is strength to the upright.' There you have the deepest secret of the life of Dr. Klopsch. Born in Germany fifty-eight years ago, he had ever since coming to this land absorbed its very best spirit. He had a clear mind which saw at a glance the abiding from the accidental, the vital from the incidental. He was always swift to act, and these qualities of vision and action made him a very powerful helper in good work. He saw the Living God back of nature; he knew the world was run by law, not chance; that sin was death; that pardon was a joy complete, and that grace was sufficient for every man. This gave a breadth to his thinking, a plan and purpose to his life and his work which charmed kings.

"The way of the Lord was his strength and his joy. This way is the only one in all the world in which any true abiding joy can be be found, because it is the way of order and the moral music of the world. This cut out of his life, time, conditions, local circumstances. For his large plans of helpfulness he knew that here and now were only part of past and future in the mighty plans of the living God for his children. So with gladness, he realized the saying of Wesley, 'The world is my parish.'

"Dr Klopsch was at the head of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which has the largest circulation of any religious paper in the world. It is read in every town and city in the United States. Its editor was every day looking, with wide-open eyes, for means of making larger its power for good. He was always anxious to find young men of striking ability and usefulness in the church and the world. Such men he brought to the attention of his readers. This in the catholic spirit that marked the man throughout, and hence THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a mighty power for good.

"This man had the courage of his convictions. He did not stand fawning on men of power, who sought to enslave the people; he did not use words to darken wisdom and halt reform. For a sober nation he stood; for proper housing of the workers he pleaded; and his voice was mighty against short weight and measure, and the adulterating and cornering of the food of the people. He spake with clarion tones, in words which rang like the notes of a trumpet calling armies to battle. It is refreshing and inspiring to meet a man of this class and practice. No prouder plume can be placed on his tomb that this. It is the prime, it is the first and highest duty of Christian men in power to work for conditions where every one can educate his powers and have a fair, open, just opportunity of living in good conditions. No help is like ability, by the grace of God, to help one's self and family. There will, however, be times when it is the duty of editors and preachers to turn aside from considering men who sell law, men who buy law, who practice the abominable tyranny which oppresses, and also that which corrupts the people and the Republic! I mean the time when pestilence, famine, earthquake, great fire, and flood demand attention. To read what this man did is to see the soul of the man. The recital facts is more thrilling than romance. It takes t soul at once over a bridge of nineteen hundred h toric years, to the synagogue at Nazareth, wh Jesus stood on that never to be forgotten Sabba morning and, turning to the sixty-first chapter Isaiah, said: 'The Spirit of the Lord is upon m because he hath anointed me to preach good tidin to the meek; he hath sent me to heal the broke hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives; to op the prison to them that are bound; to comfort that mourn that they might be called trees of rigl eousness, the planting of the Lord, that he might glorified.' Dr. Klopsch raised through his paper a friends and gave to every good work. He ask others to give also. More than three million thr hundred thousand dollars distributed in charities in Ru sia, India, China, Japan, Ita and our own land. King E ward of England decorat him; so did the Mikado of J pan. The king of Italy public thanked him for helping Me sina. But he did not do wh some men do—go far afield a neglect home. His summer ho for New York's poor childr where thousands have gone, is testimony to the power of kin ness. The Bowery Mission New York is known to men i terested in missionary work all lands. When I get quite d couraged I think of or go that noble Mission. Every d in the year it is open, each a every night it gives a loaf bread and a cup of coffee every man in the Bread Line over a thousand men. To he the story of the conversion some of these men sets on heart on fire. I know a m who was in State prison w was converted in that Missi and who is now an earnest a effective missionary here New York.

Rev. Mr. Wilkinson, Preaching in Wall Street, Upon Dr. Klopsch's Life

"In Wall Street, in its busiest part, at its busi hour, when men are planning to make money, wh all is rush and push and desire, I stop to call yo attention to this type of man who had time to pra to plan, to work, to do good and delight in it. Th brought him peace and honor at the last. I wa you—because I am a recruiting officer in the arr of Jesus Christ—to take up your cross, deny you selves, and follow my Master, the only Saviour. you, young men, who day by day throng round n I ask you to stand in the good old ways, and G will bless you as in the past he has blessed his se vants. I pray that all of us may be followe of those who, through faith and patience, inhe the promises."

MAINE STIRRED BY A REVIVAL

THE six weeks' visit of Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, Charles M. Alexander and their associate workers to Maine, comprising great evangelistic campaigns in Portland and Bangor, between January 5 and February 15, brought to that State a spiritual uplift which has made itself widely felt. The testimony of the pastors is that a new atmosphere has been created in their churches, making it easier to engage in aggressive religious work. Men in business state that the mercantile life is charged with a deeper appreciation of the Golden Rule in business. Social life has felt the impress of the meetings. The chief of police of Portland attributed the decrease in the number of offenders to the Chapman-Alexander meetings. One day there was not a criminal before the court.

Nor has the influence of the revivals been limited to the cities. Simultaneous with the meetings in Portland a dozen evangelistic meetings were held in the western part of the State, and during the Bangor meetings others were held in the eastern section.

The campaign in Maine marked the inauguration by Dr. Chapman of his new plan to [illegible] the churches the continuing agency for the p[illegible] of the evangelistic spirit, to a degree which [illegible]st has not been as fully realized as he belie[illegible] possible. Regular Sunday services have not been interfered with. On the other hand, there has been a definite application of the evangelistic ideal in the regular church services, each pastor being asked to conduct his service according to the method he and his people believe the best to bring about this object. In not a few churches evening services brought results which supplemented the more specific work of the evangelists in their district meetings, and made the pastors co-laborers and sharers in the results. Dr. Chapman has stated repeatedly that the pastor should be given a helpful atmosphere in which preach, and that if this is provided the pastor c preach with great power. This simply means c operation—a participation in the work of the chur by the pastor and his people. To secure this c operation, Dr. Chapman has outlined a plan for Pastor's Council, and by this informal organizati has sought to bring the men into closer touch wi and better understanding of the work of the churc and of their pastor's responsibility.

Charles M. Alexander

Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman

The Pastor's Council is made up of men of t church who are interested in helping to realize that is possible for the church as a force for goo It is open to men of the congregation, whether mem bers or not. At a service in Portland over 500 m signed the cards indicating their interest. Since t evangelistic meetings closed a large number of t churches have definitely organized Pastor's Council Several councils have one hundred or more men e rolled, and the interest taken by the men is a promi of better things.

Mr. Alexander conducts the singing at all of the meetings. He believes that the stranger who ha pens into a church where all sing will carry away impression of the uplift of the service. Mr. Alexa der also trains the ministers to secure this kind singing and to make the song service truly wo shipful.

The Comfort of Easter Day

By KATE UPSON CLARK

THE child was sobbing bitterly. The sweet young mother whom he loved had been buried in the earth. He thought that she had gone forever.

A loving aunt had come to take care of him, and she tried to comfort him.

"Your mother is living still, dear," she said. "You will see her again. She is watching you this minute. She loves you just the same as ever."

"No, no," wept the child; "she is dead. The doctor said so; and I know it is true, because I kissed her, and she did not kiss me back again. If she had known, she would have kissed me back again—for she always did. And, oh, oh—my mother is dead!"

"I know it seems so, darling," sighed the aunt, whose own heart was sore and heavy, "but under that still face there was yet life. Christ showed us this when he rose from the dead. He did not answer when his mother and his disciples called him; but one day he rose from this seeming death, to show us that no one really dies. That was the first Easter Day. Men had always heard—but they had never surely known before then—that the dead could rise again. Is it not beautiful, dear?"

The child for a little seemed comforted. Then he looked over to the familiar chair where the sweet mother had been wont to hold him and pet him, and again he broke into sobs. He was four or five—and his little mind could not grasp the great, sweet truth which his aunt had been telling him. At last she said, "I will show it to you some time soon, so that you will understand."

It was in the early springtime that the young mother had been laid away from his sight. The cold winds were blowing, the trees looked bare and gaunt and dead.

But among the leafless woods the aunt led the grieving child.

"See these poor trees," she said to him. "Does it not look to you as though they were quite dead?"

She felt carefully of the branch which she held out to him.

"Yes," he answered; "it is only an old dead stick—just good to burn in the fire."

"It seems so," she admitted, "but wait a while, and we will come back here again."

One warm, sunny day, a few weeks later, she took him to the same spot and showed him the same bough again. It was covered with soft, fuzzy leaf-buds, and little clusters of tender green leaves were bursting from them.

"This is the same bough that you thought was dead," she said. "What do you think now?"

"It wasn't dead, was it?" murmured the child slowly. "What pretty leaves! I am glad it wasn't dead."

"And it is so with our dear ones who die," she reminded him gently. "They seem dead, but they really live; and somewhere they are happy and beautiful—more beautiful than they were here—just as the leaves are more beautiful than the bare tree."

The child looked very sober. It was beginning to seem possible to him that his aunt might be right; though he had wept every day for his mother, and had said over and over again, "She cannot be live anywhere, or else she would speak to me and kiss me."

As the child handled the bough and thought about it, his aunt plucked from the bark of the tree some large cocoons to carry home. She showed them to him.

"What funny, silky little sticks!" he cried.

"They seem to be dead, don't they?" she said.

"They are dead," he declared positively. "They are funny little dead sticks. Are you taking them home to burn in the fire?"

"You will see by and by," she answered.

But she did not burn them. She laid them on rough pieces of wood, and placed them in a deep pan. Then she fastened strong netting over them and set the pan upright out in the cold, where it would get the wind and the rain.

One day in the early summer she took him out into the sunshine, and showed him the pan.

"Look in! What do you see?" she asked joyfully.

"Three butterflies. How bright and pretty they are!" he cried. "See how they dance about! Where did you get them?"

"They were in those dead sticks that you thought were only fit to burn; do you remember? See, there they lie, like husks! Now let us set the butterflies free."

She tore the netting, and the delicate, gay-winged creatures went sailing off into the upper air.

The child gazed after them. Then he looked back at the empty, bursted chrysalids. He remembered well the queer, brown sticks. How wonderful it was!

"They seemed dead," she reminded him again, gently; "but you see that they were not."

"No," he rejoined thoughtfully, "they were not."

"It is so with our dear ones," she repeated. "They may seem to be dead, but they are not."

One day she took some poppy seed and showed to him.

"Is it pepper?" he asked. "Or is it the powder that my father uses in his gun?"

"No," she told him. "It is not pepper, nor powder; but it seems just as dead, doesn't it?"

"Yes," he answered again, positively. "It is just as dead as it can be."

"I am going to drop it into the earth here," she said gravely; and she took up a trowel and dug into the rich earth. Then she scattered the dead powder in the hole that she had made, and covered it carefully.

A fortnight later, she took the child to see it.

"Out among the leafless woods she led him"

"You remember that dead black powder that we sowed here," she reminded him.

"Yes," he answered quickly. "It was just here. This is the little board you put in so that we might know."

"And yet these pretty little gray-green plants came from those dead, black seeds," she told him.

"Right out of them?" he asked breathlessly.

"Yes. They seemed so small and black, you know; yet there was the germ of a little plant in each one of them, and soon they will be covered with bright flowers. We could never believe anything so strange if we did not see it right before our eyes. And so it is with the loved ones that we think are dead. They are not dead; and in some other world, we do not know where, they bloom from their cold, lifeless bodies, just as the leaves broke from the tree, and as the butterflies from the cocoons, and these little plants from the dead seeds."

"Yes—yes, I see," breathed the child, through starting tears.

"But men were dull," went on the loving aunt, trying to make it very plain to him. "For hundreds of years men had seen the dead trees leave out, and the butterflies come from the dead chrysalids, and the plants spring from dead seed, and still they could not really believe that if a man died he would live again. So God sent Christ to show us all these things. He taught us how to live; and then he seemed to die, but he rose from the dead on the third day, and talked with his friends, to show us that, as he lived after death, so we should live also. And the great apostle Paul made it plainer still. He said that we were sown a natural body and we should be raised a spiritual body. We do not understand it, any more than we understand this marvelous change of the seed into the flower; but we must believe that it is true."

"Yes," breathed the child; "I see, and I must believe that my mother is up yonder"—he waved his little hand—"with a beautiful new body; not sick any more, and happy, and that I will see her again when I go up there, too."

"Yes," she said, glad to see him comforted, "you see exactly how it is."

And whenever the twilight came, and he began to weep afresh for his mother, she reminded him of it all, until the year brought around the Easter Day. Then they spoke of it again.

"You see," she explained to him, "men were so glad—so glad when this great hope came to them that they would live after death that every year they rejoice on the day Christ rose. For two thousand years they have kept that day. Just think what joy it brought into the world!"

"Is it the happiest day in the year?" he asked her.

She thought of the day of Christ's birth, and spoke of it.

"But I think," he said at last thoughtfully, "that it was more beautiful to have him come back from the dead even than to have him born; so I am going to like the Easter Day best of all."

She did not find any fault with his choice. She knew that just then, to that afflicted little heart, the thought of the Easter Day was the sweetest thing in the world.

Pleased with Paper and Premiums

Dear Editor: I received the Red Letter Bible, and was very much pleased with it, also with the "Dreamland" calendar, and was much surprised to see with it the picture of the "Daughters of Dorcas." I think they are beautifully gotten up, and worthy of nice frames. I feel very grateful to you. I enjoy THE CHRISTIAN HERALD so much, and every week look for its appearance. I have been a subscriber for some years, and feel glad that I could continue my subscription. I pray God to bless you for the noble work you are doing throughout the world. (MRS.) SARAH C. BROWN.

One Pastor's Baby-Saving Work

The Pasteurizing Plant, Morningside Presbyterian Church, New York

SAVING of babies' lives as the chief parochial work of a New York church is a novelty of practical Christianity, found in the west side of the teeming Harlem section of the city, where infant mortality is still far too high. The great apartment house district just below Morningside Heights has a large infant population. The Rev. Allen W. McCurdy, pastor of the Morningside Presbyterian Church, found that babies fell ill and died from infectious diseases when apparently they had not been exposed to contagion, and that infantile sickness claimed a heavy toll.

Enlisting the interest of the women of the parish, he set up in the church parlor a plant for modifying, bottling and pasteurizing milk. On July 12, 1909, the supplying of the milk began. In a short time the capacity of the plant was reached, and now 117 babies are fed on this milk. The eagerness of mothers to get safe milk, pro rly adapted to the needs of their babi , is illustrated by the fact that ma of them come over a mile to get eir daily supply.

Incidentally, the work has beco an inspiring factor in the life of the ar- ish, bringing the congregation nto touch with the material needs o the people, bringing women of leisur nto relation with the mothers of the or, setting idle hands busy making cl es for babies that otherwise would ve lacked.

The Morningside church is n a rich one, and it was feared the sta ng of such a work would be a drain on the resources of the congreg on, but the work has been enthusi ically maintained and enlarged. ther churches have become interested nd the multiplication of church mill ta- tions is now an interesting and ho ful possibility in New York.

Western Packers on the Meat War

By GEORGE L. McCARTHY

Secretary of the American Meat Packers' Association

I seems to me that the statement in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of Febru- a 16 was hardly fair to the packers. I efer to your saying that, "in de- fiance of public opinion, Western pack- e advanced the price of meat, and t meat sellers of Chicago and other Vstern cities have seconded the ad- vice by a proportionate rise in p es." As a matter of fact, the Vstern packers have not increased th r charges on dressed meat out of p portion to the increase of the price o live stock. In his report for 1909 t Secretary of Agriculture, after d ling extensively with live stock and n t prices, says it is apparent that d ssed meat prices have not increased in greater degree than steer prices h e at Chicago. These figures, of c rse, relate to 1909. Now, what are t facts with relation to 1910? The f owing are wholesale selling prices o meat, as quoted in New York City p ers on the dates mentioned, by one o he large packers:

anuary 1,	per hundred pounds....		$8.40
anuary 8,	"	"	.... 8.49
anuary 15,	"	"	.... 8.91
anuary 22,	"	"	.... 8.83
anuary 29,	"	"	.... 8.33
ebruary 5,	"	"	.... 8.25
ebruary 12,	"	"	.... 8.75
ebruary 19,	"	"	.... 8.83

he variations in prices are not out o proportion, and are designed to be p allel with prevailing prices of beef c le.

ermit me to call your attention to th statement in the report of the Sretary of Agriculture that "coin- cident with the beef situation is the great fall in hog prices late in 1907, when farmers sold breeding sows so as to diminish a line of unprofitable pro- duction. This procedure restricted the pork production with results that are now felt." This reduction of breeding animals, in connection with other causes, is responsible for the dimin- ished supply and increased price of hogs and hog products. You will readily discern that the Western pack- ers have nothing to do, directly or in- directly, with conditions which pro- duced the shortage in the hog crop. In addition to this shortage of hogs, and affecting the cattle likewise, is the fact that there were 3,250,000 less cattle in the country January 1, 1910, than there were three years before. Thus, with the population increasing at the rate of about one per cent. per annum, there was a heavy diminution in the forces of meat supply.

Concerning your statement that "on January 29 an order was sent out by packers from Omaha to all the live stock shippers in the Western States not to ship live stock of any kind to market until the present protest against the high price of fresh meat had died out," permit me to say that if any such statement were sent out it did not emanate from the packers. Those who ship live stock to packing centres send it to commission men, the same as vegetables, fruit, butter, eggs, etc., are shipped to your commission men. These commission men stand be- tween the actual owners of the live stock and the packers, and negotiate the sale to the packers the same as veg- etable and fruit commission men nego- tiate the sale of such products to the retailers. Each live stock commission man has his own line of customers, and undertakes to keep them advised as to the promising, or forbidding, character of the market. It is easy to be seen that a commission man who was faith- ful to his customers would advise them not to ship live stock in the face of the pending boycott of meat. The boycot- ters said, "We won't eat meat"; com- mission men said to their customers, "Don't ship your live stock, because the boycotters will not buy it." What else could have been expected as a result of the boycott? Certainly not that the commission men would have advised live stock owners to ship their stock. In such an event the market would have broken down, perhaps tremend- ously, and the packers would have been able to buy at reduced prices, to the loss of the live stock raiser. In such an event—with the packers getting the benefit of the great decline—what would have been said by those who are disposed to criticise them?

Another thing which I wish to call your attention to is the fact that ninety per cent. of the criticism concerning the advance in beef prices is predicated on the increase of prices of only a frac- tional part of the beef. A beef animal produces fifty-five per cent. of market- able meat in the carcass. Of this fifty-five per cent. twenty-six per cent. is ribs or loin, and it is on the ribs and loin that the increase that is com- plained of has been made necessary. The fact is that we need a live stock Burbank, who will evolve a meat ani- mal that is all ribs and loin. In its last analysis, the causes of the advance in prices of the better cuts of beef is due to that prosperity in which we are all rejoicing. The American people, being prosperous and having money to spend, are buying the best, instead of the less desirable portions of meat. When times are hard, people move from expensive to less expensive hous- ing accommodations. In the same way, when their incomes diminish, they move down the meat scale from porterhouse steak and rib roast to more economical portions of the meat animal. These facts are not stated as being peculiar; they are simply logical and inevitable.

Now let me call your attention to the fact that the big packing houses of Chicago do not and cannot dominate the situation and control the prices of live stock. In the first place, they are in competition with all other packing concerns, big and little. If the big packers were to refrain from buying, so as to reduce prices, they would find, simply, that the small packers, as prices fell, would rush in and buy all the stock that might be offered. Thus the large packers would be creating a condition that would give to their numerous small rivals a distinctly advantageous market; and let me call your attention to the fact that there are 748 government-inspected abattoirs. In addition to the indpendent packers, the large packing concerns—in fact, all packing concerns—are constantly in competition with stock men who are buying in the open market for the purpose of feeding and fattening. Nearly one-half the cattle that come to Chicago are sold, not for slaughter by packers great and small in that city, but for shipment, and are reshipped and taken out of the Chicago market by slaughterers. At the present time Eastern shippers are now paying higher prices for hogs. On Wednesday they bought hogs at $9.70 per hundred pounds, 20 cents higher than was paid for the same class of stock last Tuesday. In the Chicago live stock market there is a constant bidding against the packers by those who desire to obtain stock for shipment eastward for small packers.

The only thing that the packers regret is the fact that they are not sufficiently "exposed." All they ask is that the facts be known. If this were done, it would become apparent that the three per cent. profit on actual sales, which the packers make on the goods which they handle, is not in excess of a reasonable return on the business done by them or the capital actually invested, when it is considered that their business is that of handling perishable products.

Adding His Disapproval

IN one of the homes facing Central Park, New York, there is a family which contains several bright children who are a source of never-ending amusement and delight to their elder relatives. The other day one of the boys, aged eleven, turned the pennies out of his bank, and ran away to a moving picture show. The two grandmothers thought it an excellent time to impress upon the youngest, aged five, the enormity of his elder brother's conduct, and they talked most solemnly of their disappointments and the things which usually happen to little boys who run away. The youngest sat with wide-open eyes, listening intently to the chorus of disapproval which was rising in increased volume for his especial benefit. Finally he thought it was incumbent to add his voice. Turning to a young lady, who had watched the whole scene with great amusement, he wagged his head and said, "Ain't it awful, Mabel?"

EASTER BELLS

THE Easter bells again ring out
Their message sweet and clear,
O'er city square and country field
We hear them far and near.

What does their message mean to us?
Have we not better grown?
Is Christ not dearer to our hearts
Since these twelve months have flown?

Have we a little kinder been?
Have others learned to know
This precious, loving Friend of ours,
Who waits His love to show?

Oh, may our risen Lord so come
Into our hearts this day,
And bring a deeper love for Him
To live with us alway. —H. E. C.

A LITTLE THING

Changes the Home Feeling.

Coffee blots out the sunshine from many home by making the mother, or some othe member of the household, dyspeptic, nervou and irritable. There are thousands of case where the proof is absolutely undeniabl Here is one.

A Wis. mother writes:

"I was taught to drink coffee at an earl age, and also at an early age became a victir to headaches, and as I grew to womanhoo these headaches became a part of me, as was scarcely ever free from them.

"About five years ago a friend urged me t try Postum. I made the trial and the resul was so satisfactory that we have used it eve since.

"My husband and little daughter were sul ject to bilious attacks, but they have bot been entirely free from them since we bega using Postum instead of coffee. I no longe have headaches and my health is perfect.

If some of these nervous, tired, irritabl women would only leave off coffee absolutel and try Postum they would find a wonderfu change in their life. It would then be fille with sunshine and happiness rather tha weariness and discontempt. And think wha an effect it would have on the family, for th mood of the mother is largely responsible fc the temper of the children.

Questions and Answers

n forwarding MSS. to THE CHRIS-AN HERALD, enclose stamped en-opes for return, if unavailable.

E. Q., Amesbury, Mass. When was the first postal card, with return card attached, issued?

he attached return postal is of comparaely recent date. Write to the Postmaster-eral, Washington, D. C., for exact date.

M. G., Connecticut. In Lieutenant Shackleton's account of his dash for the South Pole he tells of part of the company going south to find the South Pole while others went north to find the Magnetic Pole. Will you please explain what is meant by the Magnetic Pole, as I find that others as well as myself are ignorant of what is meant?

he Magnetic Pole, toward which the needle o the compass points, is not identical with t Geographical Pole. The Magnetic Pole is e er of those points on the surface of the e h where the lines of magnetic force are ical. It is not stationary, but changes its tion slowly, probably moving in an orbit. ls but a few hundred miles from the pole, so w say, usually, that the needle points to the Nth Pole, the difference, at this distaoce, he in infinitesimal.

M. V., Foss, Okla. Give the particulars in reference to the division of the M. E. Church and the M. E. Church, South.

he Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was ganized in 1845. It separated from the parent church on the slavery question. Thirteen conferences went out. Fraternal relations were not resumed until 1876.

L. N., Haverstraw, N. Y. 1. Explain the recent electoral fight in England, and the objects of the different parties. There seem to be at least four parties: Conservatives, Laborites, Liberals and Unionists. How are these combining, and how opposing each other? 2. Why is it that the election is not closed at once? It appears to be going on from day to day, with varying results.

The Conservatives and Unionists are the same. They stood for close union of the empire, less radical measures than had been in vogue recently in Parliament, and for moderate protection and against the Lloyd-George budget. The Liberals stood for the budget, home rule for Ireland and free trade. They had a very radical programme. The Labor party is strong, but not so sweeping in its demands as the Socialists of the Continent. They are giving their support to the Liberals for the time. In Ireland there is another party, the Nationalist, working for Irish independence. They are allies of the Liberals as long as it serves their purpose. 2. The elections are not held on a certain day, but before a certain specified date. The time is set by the authorities of the parliamentary district. Though Great Britain has practically universal suffrage, there are many different qualifications for voters; so, if a man fulfils more than one, he may have more than one vote, but not in the same place. A few men have as many as twenty-five votes in twenty-five different parliamentary districts, though this is unusual; a large number have from two to three. And if the elections do not come close together, they may be able to get around to all the places in which they are entitled to cast their ballot. Ownership of property, residence, payment of certain taxes or rates, etc., may qualify a voter.

Mrs. M. F., New Baltimore. What is the law in New York State concerning a second wife, who has no children, holding one-third of her husband's property, and who was middle-aged when married?

A widow's rights are not affected by the fact that the husband was a widower when he married her. Just what the rights are depend on facts not stated; as, for example, whether the husband left a will or died intestate; whether or not he left children by his first wife, and whether he left real estate or personal property, or both.

V. R., Durhamville, N. Y. Why are the people in the District of Columbia not allowed to vote?

It has been found best to keep the seat of the national government completely under its control and not have local, factional contests, as in other cities. For a short time they were allowed to vote, and then the privilege was rescinded. A man, if he has a residence outside the District, may go home and vote. It is the idea that the government is better in charge, as it is more concerned in its well-being than any one else can be.

P. W. B., South Fork, Pa. Who made the first paper, and what was it made of?

Paper was probably made in Egypt, centuries before the Christian era. It was made of cotton about 600 A.D., and of rags about 1300.

E. F. J., South Norwalk, Conn. State the names of the States in their order, from 1815 to 1835.

Indiana, admitted 1816; Mississippi, 1817; Illinois, 1818; Alabama, 1819; Maine, 1820; Missouri, 1821. No others were admitted until 1836, when Arkansas was admitted.

Famous Christian Testimonies

W. C. Brown

FEW business men in the Eastern and Middle States are better known than Mr. W. C. Brown, senior vice-president and a director of the N. Y. C. & H. R. Railroad and its various centres, who has his headquarters in New York City. His prominence in the business world brings him into contact with men of affairs all over the country; hence he, above the majority of men, is qualified to give answer to this question, which was lately submitted to him:

"Is the spirit of Jesus more dominant in business and public affairs than when you entered active life, and is it an advantage or not for a public man to-day to be known as a professing Christian?"

Mr. Brown's reply, given below, is so clear and emphatic that it leaves no doubt in the reader's mind as to his experience and observation. It should give new impulse and encouragement to all who read it. He writes:

GRAND CENTRAL STATION, NEW YORK

December 17, 1909.

My Dear Sir:

I gladly avail myself of the opportunity to express the most confident belief that the teachings of Jesus Christ are making more actual progress in the world to-day than at any period during the nineteen centuries since the Saviour's birth. The spirit of the Master is more potent, more directly influential, in the lives of men than ever before. The heart of humanity, moved by the teachings and the spirit of the Saviour, is responding more liberally, more continuously and more intelligently to the call of the poor and the unfortunate than in any generation of the past.

It is in my opinion a distinct advantage to a man, either in public or private life, to be a Christian; and I believe there is more real, earnest, practical Christianity, and less cant and outward show of a profession of religion, than in the past. I believe more than ever before, men and women are quietly and lovingly doing, day by day, acts of charity and kindness, inspired by the promise that "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." Very sincerely,

W. C. Brown

Ingersoll-Trenton

The elite Watch for critical users; an accurate timer jewelled with seven jewels and beautifully cased.

The INGERSOLL-TRENTON solves the watch-problem for the man who wants to be told the exact time by a handsome and honestly-built watch which he can buy at a moderate price.

Every Ingersoll-Trenton watch is enclosed in an original Ingersoll-Trenton case and time-tested at the factory before shipment; watch, case and time-keeping—all three—are guaranteed by the same maker. This fact is of the utmost importance to the buyer and is the only instance of the kind in the history of watchmaking.

The Ingersoll-Trenton rivals in accuracy any other high-grade watch. It is sold by 6,000 responsible jewelers at a factory-fixed price which pleases the purchaser and puzzles other watchmakers who make their product in smaller quantities, employ expensive and (sometimes) unscrupulous selling methods, and are obliged thereby to make the watch-buyer pay unnecessary and fictitious prices.

Here are the Ingersoll-Trenton prices:

$5 in solid nickel case — $7 in 10-year gold-filled case — $9 in 20-year gold-filled case

Each watch fitted at Friction-points with seven ruby, sapphire and garnet jewels. The popularity of the Ingersoll-Trenton is sweeping the country.

The Widely-known Ingersoll Models

The famous Ingersoll Dollar Watch (together with the other Ingersoll models at $1.50 and $2) has turned the watch-world upside-down and made millions of people carry watches who never carried them before. More than seventeen millions of these watches have been sold. Twelve thousand are now being sold every day in the week. 60,000 Dealers sell them.

Ingersoll watches tick everywhere—tick truly and tell time. Ask anywhere for an Ingersoll; the dealer will know exactly what you mean.

We have published a little book, bound in an embossed cover. It contains five facts worth five dollars to anyone who is ever going to buy another watch. The title of this book is "How to Judge a Watch." What is your address? We would like to send you a copy with our compliments.

Everyday Magic

Aladdin's lamp transported its owner from place to place in the twinkling of an eye.

That was thousands of years ago—and the lamp was only a myth. But so wonderful that the story has endured to this day.

The Bell telephone is far more wonderful—and it is a reality.

It is the dream of the ages, come true. In the office, in the home it stands, as commonplace in appearance as Aladdin's lamp.

By it the human voice—the truest expression of personality, ability, and character—is carried from place to place instantly and accurately. And human powers are thus extended as if by magic.

All other means of communication are cold and colorless in comparison. By the telephone alone is the human quality of the human voice carried beyond the limitations of unaided hearing.

The Bell System has provided this wonderful faculty for all the people.

The whole country is brought together by the Bell policy of universal service; and the miracle of telephone talk is repeated six billion times a year.

The Bell Long Distance telephone puts a man in intimate touch with new resources, new possibilities. One Policy, One System, Universal Service—these make every Bell Telephone the Center of the System.

The Sabbath Rest*

IT is worth while to allude often to Professor Carl Hilty's delightful book on "Happiness," and especially to its glorification of work.

In the notes of the leader upon this lesson, one of Professor Hilty's strong points is mentioned. It is that no one has a real right to the rest of Sunday unless he has toiled during the preceding six days.

The keeping of the Sabbath among the ancient Jews was counted a cardinal virtue. It extended even to their plants, which could not be watered or plucked on that day. Of course, the ceremonies of the priests, as of those of all sects in our own day, were not accounted as labor.

We can only fully realize the intensity of the old Jewish feeling for the day when we consider the fact that a deliberate breach of the Sabbath was punishable by death.

That the national feeling on this subject approached fanaticism is seen by the record that a Jewish steersman, during a terrible storm, left the helm untended, because the hour had struck for the beginning of the Sabbath. It is well attested by passages from the books of the Maccabees, from Josephus and from Plutarch, that the Jewish armies refused to bear arms on the Sabbath, even suffering their enemies to cut them down rather than to desecrate the day.

"Prudent commanders, however," says Dr. Strong, "seeing the great advantage thus given the enemy, observed the Sabbath rest only so far as to abstain on that day from offensive operations."

The Pharisees, Essenes and Samaritans were, in the time of Christ, the chief sticklers for the old rigor. They split the very smallest of hairs in their zeal. Thus it was permitted among them to give medicine to save life; but to give it merely to make the sick more comfortable was forbidden.

Recent discoveries, as related by Delitzsch and others, indicate that a seventh day of rest was prescribed among many, perhaps most, of the ancient nations, and markedly among the Hittites and Babylonians. It seems to have been early felt that the repose of the night did not suffice for the refreshment of the human system, and that in addition a whole day of rest was needed as often as once in each week.

The Jew keeps the Sabbath as a festival. After a brief, ceremonious religious service of some kind during the morning, feasting and pleasure are the order of the day. The Jews consider that Isa. 18: 13, 14 enjoins this in saying, "If thou turn away thy foot from doing thy pleasure on my holy day, and call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honorable, then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord, and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth."

Buxdorf, one of the great authorities, says: "So convinced are the Jews that one way of honoring the Sabbath is by feasting that they sometimes fast the preceding day to enable them to eat the more at the Sabbath meals."

Our modern evangelical methods are very different. We consider this day as sacred to the higher spiritual needs of mankind. We deplore anything which tends to make it carnal or sensual.

As for the special deeds to be done or left undone on the Sabbath, men are more and more leaving them to the individual conscience; but let each of us remember that, according to the way the great rest-day is spent, so will character degenerate or improve. Let us keep the Sabbath Day holy.

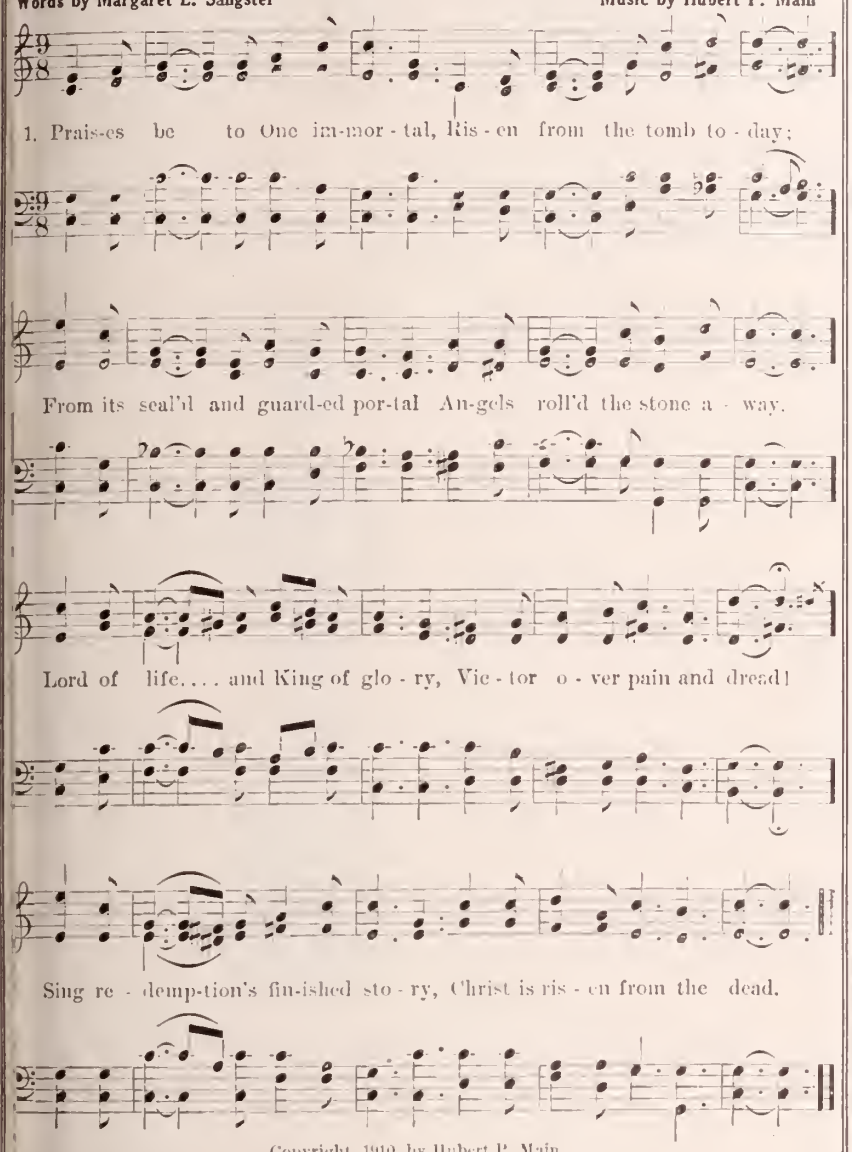
A Hymn of Eastertide

Words by Margaret E. Sangster — Music by Hubert P. Main



1. Prais-es be to One im-mor-tal, Ris-en from the tomb to-day;
From its seal'd and guard-ed por-tal An-gels roll'd the stone a-way.
Lord of life.... and King of glo-ry, Vic-tor o-ver pain and dread!
Sing re-demp-tion's fin-ished sto-ry, Christ is ris-en from the dead.

Copyright, 1910, by Hubert P. Main.

II.

rough His hands the nails were driven,
Thus He bore our shame and loss.
the spear His heart was riven,
Lifted there upon the cross.
sus died for our salvation,
Jesus lives that none may die, ho from every tribe and nation
Unto Him in love draw nigh.

III.

Hallelujah! Shout the chorus
Till it swells from shore to shore.
Christ, who died, is reigning o'er us;
Christ, who lives for evermore.
Hallelujah! He shall never Lose a soul He died to save.
Hallelujah! Love forever
Lights the darkness of the grave.

An Easter Song of Triumph

By JOHN M. MORSE, Passaic, N. J.

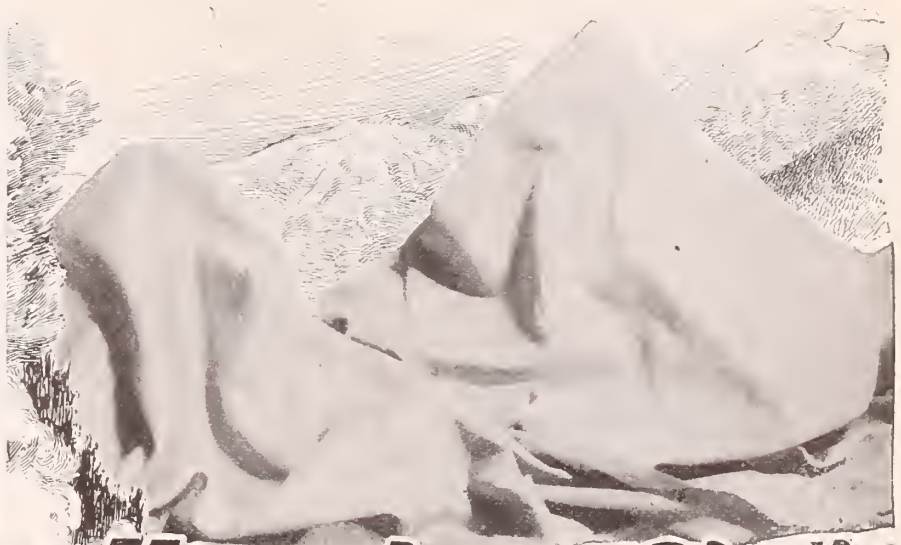
AWAKE, O Earth! awake,
To-day the Saviour rose!
Let songs of gladness break
The triumph of His foes.
Awake, awake! His praises sing:
With joy let heaven's arches ring.

They thought to crush His power—
To cover Him with shame.
He triumphed in that hour,
All glory to His name.
All glory to the Saviour give;
Through Him we evermore shall live.

The cross, the nails, the spear!
"Himself He cannot save."
Henceforth they would not fear,
For He was in His grave.
Exultant, while disciples fled,
They set a watch to guard the dead.

The grave could not Him hold!
His wraps were laid aside:
Away the stone was rolled;
He lived! the crucified!
Ye sons of men, rejoice, rejoice!
Give praise to God, with heart and voice.

God's well beloved Son
Henceforth a crown shall wear.
A victory He won
Which saves from dark despair.
The risen Christ whom we adore
Shall reign supreme for evermore.



Himalaya Cloth

TRADE MARK

An Exact Reproduction of the Fashionable Rough Silks

AT ABOUT ONE-QUARTER OF THEIR COST

35 Cents Per Yard

27 Inches Wide 75 Shades and Colors

Himalaya Cloth was developed after years of experiment in response to the demand for fabric which would be as beautiful as the real Rough Silks, yet would have great durability, would not wear fuzzy and would stand all the tests of the laundry.

Its success was as immediate as it was deserved. Nothing that can be said about Himalaya Cloth, however, is so convincing as an inspection of the cloth itself. Then it will be evident that it is no overstatement to say that an expert can hardly distinguish between "Himalaya" and silks that cost $1.00 to $1.50 per yard.

It is ideal for Suits, Coats, Evening and Automobile Wraps, Evening Gowns, Shirt Waists, Children's Dresses, and for every purpose where real silk is desirable.

The excellence of Himalaya Cloth is due to three things: the peculiar character of the rough yarns, the care used in weaving, and the perfect finish which insures the permanent brilliancy.

Before the cloth leaves the mill every piece is rigidly inspected and those which are flawless in every particular are stamped with the word "Himalaya" on the selvage. This word is your guarantee of perfection. Do not accept anything which may be represented as like "Himalaya," or the same as "Himalaya." Such fabrics may be goods which are imperfect and rejected as unworthy to be stamped "Himalaya," or cheap imitations. [See the word "Himalaya" for yourself on the selvage.

Ask for Himalaya Cloth at the wash goods counter of your dealer. If it is not in his stock, write us giving his name.

Let me send you one of my beautiful silk petticoats

—Mrs. Delworth

I WANT to show you how easy it is to get one of my high grade all-silk petticoats, exactly as shown in the picture. Notice the very high trimmed sectional flounces, the upper section trimmed with two groups, each consisting of four dainty air tucks; lower sections joined with fashionable bands; all tailor made and beautifully proportioned, with full flare at bottom of about four yards. Full depth underlay and dust ruffle of good quality cotton.

The silk in this petticoat is very heavy and strongly woven, a fine, rich, lustrous black. In fact, if you bought the silk alone at your local store, it would cost more than I am asking for the completed skirt. I give you all the middleman's profits, and by selling direct from mill to weaver, give you the most astonishing petticoat value you ever heard of. You also get, with each skirt, my absolute guarantee of satisfaction or money back, and buy for less than the actual retail price of the material.

Samples FREE This petticoat is sold at such a low price that I cannot afford the large investment that would be necessary if I made it in a variety of colors, and hence I offer it in black only, but I will gladly send free samples of the silk used in making it, together with sample card of colors and petticoats of other styles. You will be delighted, I know, with the catalogue, and I urge you to send for it to-day, even though you may not be quite ready to buy a petticoat. I want every woman to know how easy it is to get her petticoats, both black and colors, at a lower price than even her store has to pay.

This Handsome $5 Petticoat, $3.75

A Perfect Fit Guaranteed

Give me the length desired (from 36 to 44) and I will guarantee a perfect fit or the skirt may be returned at my expense and I will refund every cent paid. The petticoat shown in the picture is my Spring leader, latest style, fashionable cut. At $5.00 I know you would say it was extra good value, but for a time I will send it to any reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for only $3.75. Send your express or post office address, with money order for $3.75, and I will send you the best petticoat value in the world.

Accept My Liberal Offer

This liberal bargain is offered to increase my list of customers and to show the saving that is made by my new plan of selling petticoats direct from "mill to wearer."

One Customer Writes: "I have just received the beautiful silk petticoat and I am delighted with it. I will take pleasure in showing it to my friends and will try to induce them all to patronize you. It will be to their advantage to do so. Thanking you for the splendid quality of garment and your promptness in sending it, etc."

Write me personally to-day and get this beautiful silk petticoat by return express. You run no risk, as my guarantee is absolute—money back if not satisfactory. The publishers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would not accept this advertisement if they were not fully assured of my responsibility.

A Prayer-Answering God*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

WHEREVER God appoints us to suffer or to work, if we first grasp his all-conquering hand in prayer, we can go. On one occasion the Duke of Wellington needed a soldier for a post of great peril. Not wishing to send a man against his will to almost certain death, he called for a volunteer. A soldier stepped forward and said to the duke: "Give me one grasp of your all-conquering hand and I can go."

In our lesson study to-day we see two blind men, each with his strong right hand of earnest prayer, grasping God's right hand of power, and so being lifted out of darkness into light. They sat by the wayside as Jesus passed. "Have mercy on us, thou Son of David!" they cried out in prayer. But feeling that they had failed to reach him, they followed him into the house, possibly Matthew's home.

"Believe ye that I am able to do this?" Jesus asked them. And they answered, "Yea, Lord." And then he touched their eyes, saying, "According to your faith, be it done unto you." And then they were no longer blind!

The Right Hand of Power

We see a sick woman, with her thin right hand of imperfect faith grasping God's right hand of power, and so being lifted out of weakness into strength. Sick for twelve years! How emaciated she must have been! Mark tells us that "she had suffered many things of many physicians, and had spent all that she had and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse" (Mark 5:25, 26). She did not touch the body of Christ, but only his garment, and only the fringe of his garment, one of the four tassels of four white threads and one blue one, which were on the corners of Jesus' robe. The woman touched it and was made well. Jesus knew what had happened, though he had not looked behind to see her. When Jesus asked, "Who touched my garment?" she knew that she had been discovered, and she came and fell down in front of Jesus, in fear and trembling. But he said to her, in tender accents, "Daughter, thy faith hath made thee whole." Then she was no more ill.

We see a sad father, with his arm around his little daughter, who is dying. With his other hand he grasps God's right hand of power, and so, with his child, is lifted out of the valley of the shadow of death. Jesus was at dinner when Jairus, father of the dying child, sought him. As Jairus fell on his knees before the feasting Christ, lifting up his hand of prayer, Jesus at once clasped it with his outstretched hand of sympathy and helpfulness, and started with him from the house of feasting to the house of mourning, which is the better place to go when it is the place of duty and of opportunity.

It was on the way to the house of Jairus that the woman touched his garment. How that delay must have troubled Jairus, to whom every moment seemed an age, because it might bring death to his little daughter. But that very delay was to teach praying ones in every age that they lose nothing by delays in answers to their prayers. Christ had power to raise the daughter of Jairus out of death as easily as out of sickness, and there was greater glory to be brought to God, and greater joy and blessing to that house by the delay which made the miracle greater.

Jairus had large faith when he came to Jesus, for he said, counting his daughter as good as dead, "Lay thy hand upon her and she shall live." And she was dead when Jesus reached the house; and not only dead, but the ceremonies for the dead had been commenced, such as the wailing by hired mourners.

Jesus put them all out, and said, "She is not dead, but sleepeth." The record is that "they laughed him to scorn." As men and women looked at her she was dead, but in God's sight she was not dead, for he had power to make her alive again. How brief the record: He entered in; he took the child by the hand; he said to her, "Talitha cumi." The girl had heard those words often before, for it was the common form used by the Hebrew mothers to wake the children, and meant "Little one, rise." How sweet it was for Jesus to use just the words!

Immediately the little girl arose from her bed, and began to walk about the room. The parents were startled, but Jesus calmed their fears by telling them to bring food for her to eat. How strange that Jesus should have told the parents not to tell any one what had happened! How could they keep such a wonderful event a secret! Jesus did not mean that they should deny what had been done, only that they should not get up an excitement about it, and so turn the thoughts of the people from the Gospel that he was trying to present to them. How we wish we might know about the beautiful life of good works and works the child must have lived after that, growing into womanhood with all Christian graces.

Perhaps some father and mother who read this story have a story of their own to tell, how they prayed their dear child back to life from near death. Jesus can and does hear such prayers now in heaven, as he did when he was upon earth. Another little girl of twelve years of age lay dying of typhoid fever. She was supposed to be in the last stages. But earnest prayer was made for her by her mother and a loving aunt. As they watched and prayed they saw a change for the better, and then she improved so rapidly that she was soon out of danger. More than forty years have passed since then and the life thus saved through prayer has been blessing the world every day and hour of that time, and the end is not yet.

Some one has said: "Never think that God's delays are God's denials. True prayer always receives what it asks, or something better."

Awaiting the Answer

A noble boy, ten years of age, was critically ill. Parents and friends prayed almost unceasingly for his recovery. Day after day passed without any change in the little patient. There was a brother, six years old, Bert, who lovingly prayed that God would make his brother Eddie well. He finally became so impatient he went to his mother with the question: "Why doesn't God answer 'Yes' or 'No'? Many an older person has not learned to wait on the Lord; there should be not only waiting, but believing that God will send an answer, and the best answer.

"I don't know how long the little heart will hold out," wrote a father to a friend about his son, nine years old, who had a complication of diseases. The friend replied: "If it must be that the little heart shall beat weaker and

Longing and Listening

To stretch my hand and touch Him,
Though he be far away;
To raise my eyes and see him
Through darkness as through day:
To lift my voice and call him—
This is to pray!

To feel a hand extended
By one who standeth near;
To view the love that shineth
In eyes serene and clear;
To know that he is calling—
This is to hear!

Miracles as Teachers of Prayer

What is a miracle? The Gospels use four words to describe miracles, namely, "wonder," "work," "sign," "power." Putting these together, and all other Bible references to miracles, we get the following definitions: Miracles are "works," or events in the external physical world, capable of being discovered by the senses, and incapable of being rationally ascribed to any but a supernatural will, and that divine; "works" which are calculated to excite "wonder," because they are of such a nature as to be "signs," or evidences, of the presence of a superhuman "power" confirming the authority of a divine mission.

Sir Oliver Lodge, an eminent British scientist, has said: "The seeker after miracle, in the exceptional and narrow or exclusive sense, is pining for a catastrophe; the investigation of a miracle, in the continuous and broad or comprehensive sense, has the universe for a laboratory." He also says: "Miracles lie all around us, only they are not miraculous. Special providences envelop us; only they are not special. Prayer is a means of communication as natural and as simple as speech." If we study the Bible closely we will see: (1) that there were seasons of miracles in the time of Abraham, of Moses, of Elijah, of Daniel, and of Christ and the apostles; (2) each of these seasons extended over a period of about seventy years; (3) each series of miracles was necessary to confirm man's faith in God. (a) Abraham guided and guarded as he departed from his kinsmen; (b) the Hebrews enslaved in Egypt, freed from bondage, guided and protected on their long journey to the Promised Land; (c) Elijah and the worshipers of the true God sustained when and where idolatry was rampant, by such miracles as fire sent from heaven in answer to prayer, burning up the sacrifice set up by Elijah, while the sacrifice set up by the Baal worshipers received no response from their god, though they had prayed all day to him; (d) the wonderful works done by Jesus and his apostles made it possible for the people to believe in the Gospel.

The Miracles of Jesus Encourage Prayer

1. Water turned into wine at Cana. We should be encouraged to pray for things we lack.

2. Capernaum nobleman's son cured of sickness. We may pray for health.

3. The draught of fishes when Peter had toiled all night and caught nothing. We may pray for God's help in temporal affairs.

4. The demoniac healed. We may pray with the assurance that nothing is to hard for him.

5. Peter's wife's mother brought immediately from a bed of fever to a condition where she could serve the household with food. We may pray for speedy and complete restoration to health.

6. He healed all who were brought to him, a great throng in Capernaum. An encouragement to us to pray for others.

7. Leper healed. However low our condition, he will help us if we pray to him.

8. The centurion's servant healed. A master should pray for his servants.

9. A widow's son raised from the dead. We are sure of his sympathy when we pray.

10. The tempest calmed. In times of great extremity, he will hear our prayers.

11. The demoniacs of Gadara healed. Though men despise us, God will hear us when we pray.

12. Man sick of the palsy cured. God will answer importunate prayer.

13. Jairus' daughter raised to life. He will hear and answer the prayers of parents for their children.

14. Woman who touched him healed. Prayer may be an act, when it cannot be a word.

15. Sight restored to two blind men. We should be definite in our prayers; ask, and it shall be given you.

16. Helpless cripple at Bethesda healed. Jesus will even answer us when we pray and are discouraged.

17. A withered hand cured; the man made an attempt to stretch out his hand when Jesus told him to do it. We must work and pray, doing all we can for ourselves.

18. Five thousand fed. We are encouraged to pray for multitudes of people, churches and nations, for he can help many as well as few.

19. Canaanite woman's daughter healed. A mother's prayer is precious in his sight.

20. A deaf and dumb man cured by his touch. We come into a personal relation to Christ through prayer.

21. Four thousand fed. We are encouraged to pray for daily bread.

22. He was transfigured. We may pray to be delivered from the fear of death, since those in heaven and on earth are close to him.

23. Blind man restored to sight.

24. Boy possessed of devils cured. No case is too hard to bring to Jesus in prayer.

25. Man born blind restored to sight through his obedience to Jesus' command to go and wash in the pool of Siloam. We must obey as well as pray.

26. A woman cured on the Sabbath day of an infirmity under which she had suffered for eighteen years. We may pray for help on the Sabbath day.

27. Dropsical man cured. Scoffers cannot hinder Jesus' answer to our prayers.

28. Ten lepers healed. Jesus healed them all, but only one gave him thanks. Thanksgiving belongs to prayer.

29. The two blind men healed by the wayside. We may pray for help anywhere we chance to be.

30. Lazarus raised from the dead. Jesus answers even the prayer of despair.

31. The fig tree blasted. The prayers of those who are unfaithful will not be answered.

32. The ear of Malchus healed. God knows what we have need of before we pray.

33. His resurrection. It teaches us how to pray for the dying.

34. The draught of fishes after his resurrection. Neither life nor death can separate us from the Christ to whom we pray.

35. The ascension of Christ. He is still our prayer-hearing Saviour.

A DANGEROUS FLIGHT

EVEN if man is able to make a flying machine which will bear him safely aloft for hours at a time, it seems likely that the limitations of his physical make-up will keep him from following the path of the eagle and soaring to a great altitude. Recently two German aeronauts started on an upward expedition to see how far they could go above the earth's surface. They wore oxygen masks. When they reached a height of 16,000 feet they had to inhale oxygen every two minutes, as they were beginning to gasp for breath, and had palpitation of the heart. When a height of nearly 27,000 feet was reached, one aeronaut removed his mask and immediately fainted. The air was intensely cold, the glare of the sun almost terrifying. After they returned to earth, it was two days or more before they were physically in a normal condition.

In any other player if lint wears off the rolls and gets into the pneumatics it may take days of an expert's time and cost dollars of your money to locate the obstruction. On this player if any pneumatic did not speak I could tell instantly which it was. I pull it out, blow in it, replace it and in two minutes the trouble is remedied at no expense.

MRS. BUTLER'S TRAMP

By Susan M. Griffith

IT was a bitterly cold winter's morning. The snow lay thick on the frozen ground, and trees and bushes were heavily weighted with the white covering. A raw northeast wind was blowing a gale, shrieking about the corners, rattling the windows, and wailing down the big chimney of the Butler farmhouse with dismal insistency.

Within, all was bright, cozy and comfortable. A summery heat diffused itself through the ample kitchen, and pleasant odors from the bakeoven of the big range told a savory story of good things to eat. Mrs. Butler was in the midst of the midweek baking; "up to her eyes in work," as she was fond of saying; and Mary, the only daughter of the house, was just as busy getting things in train for dinner.

"You'll have to move your pan of beans to the front of the oven, daughter," said the busy housewife, making prints in her mince pies with a silver thimble. "I want the hottest place for my pies and bread. They are almost ready to put in. What time is it? Eleven? Oh, no; half-past ten. My, I was frightened! I want to get everything baked before dinner, for we've got to get an early start, if we go to missionary meeting. The mite-boxes are to be opened to-day, you know. Miss Curtis stopped in, this morning, to remind me. She says there's to be a fine programme. The topic is a Home Mission one, 'The Stranger Within Our Gates.' I guess it's on the immigrant question. Of course, we hope to get a good lot out of the boxes. Mine isn't half full, and I'm sorry for it, but, do the best I could, I just couldn't fill it. I've sacredly given a tenth, too, of all I've had, but I haven't had much. The hens have been so mean about laying, and since your pa sold the Jersey cow I haven't had much butter to let go."

"I have only fifty cents in my box," said Mary, laughing. "Chances to earn money have been slim this year."

"Oh, well, that's all right," said Mrs. Butler. "No one is required to give what she hasn't got. I did want to put in a nickel a week, anyway, but there's been such a heap of calls; more calls than money to meet them. I'm afraid it will be bad walking to the church, but we'll make it all right, I guess. Somebody's at the door, Mame; open it, please."

Mary opened it. Upon the step stood a man about twenty-five years of age, poorly clad, his clothes being exceedingly thin and threadbare. He had no overcoat, and was shivering pitifully. His eyes looked into Mary's with wild entreaty, then wandered wistfully to the big fire in the warm kitchen.

"Can you give me a bite to eat, lady?" he asked, in a tremulous, hesitating tone. "I hate to beg, but I'm on the verge of starvation. If there's any work of any sort that I can do to pay for it, I'll be more than glad to do it. It's a bitter day," and he shuddered as an icy blast swept round the corner, tearing at his thin coat and nearly taking him off his feet.

Mary had it on the tip of her tongue to say, "We never feed tramps," but the silent entreaty in his sad eyes arrested the words. She turned to her mother. "Shall I let him in?" she asked in an undertone, adding half playfully, "It is Home Mission work, perhaps it will do as well as a full mite-box. He is a 'stranger within the gates,' you know, mother."

The idea seemed to strike Mrs. Butler with approval. She craned her neck to look out of the half-open door. The storm was a cruel one, really, she thought. She smiled, nodded briskly, and said: "Why, yes, daughter, let the poor creature come in by the fire and get good and warm. It is awfully cold, sure enough; I'd hate to shut a dog out in a day like this. The teakettle is singing a right good song; you might make him a pot of coffee, if you care to, and dish up a lot of them beans you've got baking." And then, with her own hands, she wheeled a stand near the fire, spread it with bread, butter and apple-sauce, a cup and saucer, plate, knife and fork and spoon, and placed a chair for the stranger before it. Then she turned and looked him over critically. He was certainly very dirty. His hands and face were grimy, and his unkempt hair looked as if it had not known a comb for a week at least.

"She said grace for the stranger"

"Suppose you take a good wash before you eat," she said, as he stood before the grateful heat of the fire and held out his cracked and bleeding hands. "You'll feel better, and enjoy your meal better, too. There's a plenty of hot water in the reservoir, and a basin and towel and soap in the back room there. And here's a comb! It's a new one, and you can put it in your pocket and carry it along with you; it'll come right handy."

The tramp thanked her humbly, and gratefully accepted her offer. While he was engaged in the cleansing process Mrs. Butler and Mary held a whispered consultation, the result of which was an addition to the repast of a large quarter of apple pie and a couple of fat doughnuts.

"Now, set right up and eat your fill," said the good woman, as the man again appeared, greatly transformed. "You can eat and warm at the same time, and I hope the good Lord will make you truly thankful for what you receive."

It seemed like sacrilege to Mrs. Butler to partake of food without asking a blessing, and in this way she pronounced grace for the stranger, seeing that he was not minded to do it himself.

"I hope he will, ma'am," said the man, gazing at her with a suspicious moisture in his eyes. "Though he has no need to do that, either, seeing I am about as thankful as I can well be, to you, at least."

"It is much more fitting that you thank the good Lord than me," said Mrs. Butler, who delighted in sentence sermons. "It is from him that 'every good and perfect gift' comes. 'He gives us richly all things to enjoy.'

u know that, don't you?" she asked.
"I presume I knew it once," said the anger, falling to upon the hot, comting food with great appetite. "I s not badly taught. But the biggest t of my religious education is like old, forgotten song; there's a fariar strain comes to mind once in a ile, but I couldn't sing the tune ough to save my life."
"Well, I never!" This exclamation surprise was not so much because the stranger's forgetfulness as the nner of his expressing it. Mrs. tler mused upon it as she tested her ad to see if it was sufficiently light, l put it in the oven. Then she pped directly in front of her guest l put an abrupt question:
"See here," said she, "where did you e from, and what's the matter? at business has a sensible, smart, e-bodied young man like you to be mping about the country begging r bread, when you ought to be earnit? That's what I want to know."
The man looked at her a moment, as e pitied her ignorance of the great, stling, crowded, busy world, and n answered civilly:
"Madam, I am one of the many vict's of the recent strike in Ogdensg. I have been without steady rk for over two months, and have b ely existed by doing odd jobs here l there. Finally, I found I had no nce in Ogdensburg, so I took to the d and have tramped it here, hoping get a job in a shop or on a farm, b I haven't had a bit of luck. Everyb y seems dead set against me, and ifs hard to get even a slice of bread, ugh I'm willing to do any kind of rk to pay for it. If you'll believe m ma'am, this is the first really dect meal I've eaten for more than a k."
Mrs. Butler was used to tramps and ir cunningly devised stories. She s not much inclined to befriend m, but something in this man's rds and manner touched her. He s more than ordinarily intelligent l seemed honest and truthful. She w Mary into a corner of the kitchen, were they consulted together for some e in low tones.
"I can help him just as well as not, i have a mind," said the older woma at last. "What do you think, Mry? Would you do it?"
Mary's blue eyes twinkled. "Yes, I bieve I would, mother," she said stly. "This is as much Home Miss as anything, it seems to me. Haps it will be equal to a full mite-b. Don't you think perhaps the Lrd will look at it in that way? 'Inasnch,' you know."
Yes, Mame, I do think so; you're rht, and I'll do it." And, coming bk to the stranger, she spoke out spaight and square, as her fashion was: "See here!" said she, "I'm not in the habit of doing risky, foolish things, but I'm going to try it this once, because I believe you'll work if you get the chance. I've got a son living in Crompton. It's ten miles off, but the road is a good one, and there's lots of travel on it, and likely you can get a lift along the way. My son is a big coal merchant, and employs lots of hands. I'll have my daughter, here, write a note to him asking him to give you a job, and you can carry it straight to him yourself. If you ain't in the habit of shrinking from hard, dirty work, you'll get on all right. Be sure you hunt him up right away, now, and give him the note. The address is H. C. Butler, 125 Pine Street, Crompton. She'll put it on the note so you can't miss it. I'll be sure to know whether you give it to him or not, rest assured, and I'll know, if he don't get it, that you ain't worth the sympathy and help we've tried to give you."
The man looked perfectly dumbfounded as he took the letter and put it in the pocket of his shabby coat.
"He'll get it, lady, don't you be a bit afraid," he said. "He'll get it this very day. What are ten miles after a meal like the one I have just eaten? I feel like a new man. God in heaven bless you both; you're Christian ladies, if there are any such in the world." And out in the storm he strode, no longer with dejected air and shambling tread, but with a firm, quick step and uplifted head, as if he felt that life was again worth the living.
Two days later there came a letter from the son in Crompton. "Your tramp turned up all right," it said, "and I've given him a job. He seems all O. K."
Another letter, a month later, stated: "Your tramp, Willard Kent, is doing fine. Has joined the Y. M. C. A., and goes to Sunday School and church like a Christian. In fact, I think he is one. He often says that you taught him what Christianity means."
"There's more than one way to fill a mite-box, isn't there, mother?" said Mary. "If we haven't always silver and gold, we can give what we have, if it is but a meal of victuals or a helpful word."
"The thing of it is," said Mrs. Butler, "I shan't feel like refusing to feed tramps any more. I hate to be taken in by them, but if I help one in twenty, even, I suppose I oughtn't to mind. After all, Mame, it was a mighty little thing we did for that poor fellow, and to think it saved him from despair, and maybe starvation."
"And saved him to God," said Mary softly. "Mother, my interest in Home Missions is on the increase."
"And mine, too," said Mrs. Butler, emphatically.

THE UNDERFEED WAY

CLEAN, EVEN HEAT- at LEAST Possible Cost.

IMMENSE heating bills and not enough real heat to talk about, aptly describes past winter experiences in thousands of American homes. It was an old-fashioned winter. People depending on ordinary heating methods, have shivered in "cold storage atmosphere" that cost them more than usual. The UNDERFEED banishes all discomforts of winter. It is certain the UNDERFEED provides clean, even heat, at least possible cost. So many people KNOW this that we have broken all records for the sale of modern heating plants. Thousands have money in the bank because

The Peck-Williamson Underfeed

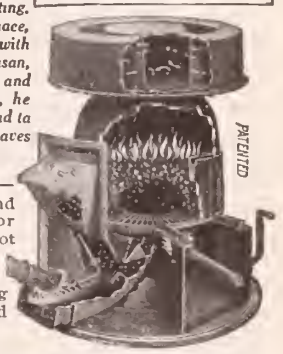
HEATING SYSTEMS WARM AIR FURNACES-BOILERS STEAM-HOT WATER

Save 1/2 to 2/3 of Coal Bills

Pea sizes of hard and soft coal and cheapest slack—which would smother the fire in ordinary furnaces and boilers — yield in the UNDERFEED as much clean, even heat as highest priced coal. There's where great saving comes in. Coal is fed from below. All the fire is on top. Smoke and gases, wasted in other furnaces, are thus consumed and turned into heat. That's more saving. The Underfeed requires little attention. Ashes are few and are removed by shaking the grate bar as in ordinary furnaces and boilers.

This illustration shows the Underfeed Boiler.

Illustration shows furnace without casing, cut away to show how coal is forced up underfire, which burns on top.



H. C. Weeks, Washington, D. C., is enthusiastic over his Underfeed. He writes:

"I never before had such satisfaction with heating. There is far less dust and smoke from this furnace, using SOFT coal, than from the ordinary furnace with hard coal. When I began buying coal this season, I said to my dealer: 'I have the bulge on you,' and after I told him of saving half my heating expense, he replied: 'well, that's good for you.' I have not had to take back anything. The Underfeed does the work, saves the expense and labor."

The Strawberry Handkerchief

A Tale of Colonial Days in Old New York

By AMELIA E. BARR

IN a few minutes dinner was ready, and the company rose to go to the room in which it was served. And either by design or accident, in this general movement Captain Van Vroom, Virginia and Batavius were standing together. The Captain seized the opportunity.

"Friends," he said, "before we eat, I will ask you to rejoice with me in the engagement of my daughter Virginia to my friend and partner, Captain Batavius De Vries."

Quick, pleasant exclamations full of kindness followed this announcement; and during them Batavius passed in front of his future father-in-law, took Virginia's hand, and kissed her.

And at that moment the door was flung wide open, and Joris Artaveldt entered.

He wore a riding suit, and cavalry cloak, boots and spurs, and was mud-stained, and weather-stained, and altogether out of comparison with his usual spick-and-span nicety. But he was inflamed by a passion so towering that it gave to his dress a singular element of fitness. It was the expression of the disorder within the man. He strode into the room unmindful of every one present, and, standing before Virginia, said in angry, disdainful tones:

"You cruel, perfidious woman!"

"Joris—I——"

"Take back your promise! Take back the love-token you gave me!" and he impetuously took from his breast the Strawberry Handkerchief, and, tearing it violently in two, he flung it at her feet.

The next moment he had disappeared. To the clatter of sword and spurs, and one sharp cry from Virginia, he went. But the surprise was so great, and the actions and the words of the youth so quick and domineering, that no one interrupted him. Batavius was too eager to secure the torn handkerchief, and the Captain had instantly made up his mind to treat the circumstances as a bit of boyish romancing, while no one else in the room had the right to question or reprove.

Madame Van Vroom kept her eyes upon her daughter. She saw that when Batavius stooped for the handkerchief, Virginia put her foot upon the torn symbol, and that it was then quickly lifted and slipped into the small bag she carried over her arm. But the affair was dismissed as soon as possible. The Captain's tone of angry pity for the love-sick boy was ably seconded by the laughter and jokes of Batavius, who really seemed to regard the interruption as quite a compliment to himself. Dinner was not delayed five minutes by the event, and in the little confusion of seating her guests Madame managed to whisper to her daughter, "Keep thyself together. It will be over in two hours."

But the girl, calm as she looked, was suffering cruelly. There were passing moments when she hardly knew what she was saying or doing. It was hard work for her to keep the grip on consciousness, and indeed she felt as if it would be a luxury beyond words to let consciousness slip and fall into some abysmal forgetfulness. Just at the moment, however, when endurance seemed no longer possible, the rather forced merry-making was brought to an abrupt conclusion. The discussion on the Stamp Tax had taken rather a quarrelsome turn, for Batavius became very dictatorial with his opinons and advices.

"You will have England's anger for your nonsense, Mr. Parker," he said, "and if so, I pity you."

"De Vries," he retorted, "let me see the man who will dare to put the stamped paper into circulation."

At these words the door was pushed open a little way, and an uncouth face, fringed with red hair, looked through the aperture. Captain Van Vroom stood up instantly.

"What is it, Mason?" he asked.

"The Stamps have come."

"When?"

"An hour ago."

"How did they come?"

"The ship that brought them was protected by a war vessel, a tender, and the guns of the fort."

"Where are they?"

"The ship lies in mid-river, off the government wharf—the war vessel and tender are guarding her."

"Well?"

"All the streets leading to the government wharf are crowded. The ships in harbor have lowered their colors. The flags on the Exchange, the City Hall, and most of the hotels are at half-mast. They are muffling the bells in the churches."

"Come, friends," said the Captain, but there was no need to call them. The men were all on their feet, and the next minute they were hurrying toward the city. As they went, they heard bells in all directions ring out their muffled, funereal tones. Very soon they met a band of drummers. The drums were muffled in crape, and as they looked at the Captain and his friends, they pointed with their black-bound sticks to the river. Speech was unnecessary. No words could have said plainer:

"The Stamps have come!"

CHAPTER EIGHT

THE TROUBLE LOVE MAKES

THE breaking up of the dinner party was not disagreeable to Batavius. He had had a great triumph over his rival, Joris Artaveldt, and he had so cleverly surprised Virginia that he had taken the kiss she had always refused him as a right, not as a favor. He wished now to find some acquaintance to whom he could praise himself. Somehow the ladies at the dinner table had not seemed aware of his special right to prominence that day. They had all furtively watched Virginia, and no one had made any observation which drew attention to his position with regard to young Artaveldt, nor yet complimented him on his sensible good-nature in ignoring it.

He thought it ought to have been the topic of conversation, and yet all the men had been too absorbed in their threepenny politics to discuss such an interesting event.

Even after the departure of the men, no one made any allusion to Batavius. In spite of his fine dress, his jokes, and his high spirits, in spite of the romantic intrusion of Joris Artaveldt, he had made no impression. None of the three matrons present wanted to talk about him; they went together to the front gate and listened with grave faces to the aching sounds of the muffled bells and drums, and then began to make excuses for a hurried leave-taking. Madame Van Heemskirk was anxious about her son Bram, who always would be at the point of danger; and the dominie's wife had two young nephews who must be kept off the streets if possible. Nor was their hostess sorry to be left alone. She had her own cares and anxieties, and the anguish and despair she had seen in her daughter's eyes was an entreaty for pity she could not deny.

They c d see nothing hut her dress, and th e dreadful moonstones. The men m ht have seen that she was fainting, dy g, but they were too busy with th turkey and the Stamp Act. Her fa er, who said he loved her so much, sa only Batavius and his sickening sa sfaction with events, that were ut rmost misery to her. And her m her—thank God. her mother saw, h mother understood! In quick, pit- if glances she had said to her, "Be p ent. Be strong. It is only a little lo er."

he went over and over the same r d of distressful memory, until her br n and her heart alike refused to e tain longer such monotony of suf- f ng. Then sleep wrapped her like a arment, and while thus wrapped s e miracle of physical restoration a spiritual light befell her. When sl awoke it was night, and the house w very still. For a moment or two sh lay softly smiling. From head to fe she was so perfectly full of rest. Th n like a flash her sorrow found her ou she remembered everything. But th front and the end of all her trouble w the shame of the kiss that Batavi had publicly taken. It had dis- h ored and despoiled her, and oh, gr f of griefs, and shame of shames, Jo s had witnessed her degradation! Wh bitter tears, she confessed Joris to ave done right to throw her love ar her promise back to her.

his thought brought her the mem- o of the rejected handkerchief, and sh rose and found the bag that held it o the floor. Passionately she kissed th torn, disdained symbol. It had la on the heart of Joris; so then, n her own heart she would keep it fo ver more.

tanding with the little bag in her h ds as she made this tender vow, she sa a glimmer of light approaching, ar heard her mother's step.

oftly she unbolted the door, and st d at the opening to welcome her.

Moeder, moeder, come in to me."

Yes, thou dear one. I have brought th some bread and milk. Can thou ea now?"

think so. What time is it?"

Near midnight. I have been at thy d three times. Fast on sleep I th ght thee. So mereiful is God! W n we suffer, very soon he says: 'It is ough, sleep.'"

That is the truth. When I could bear no more, I fell on sleep. Moeder, I thought my heart would break."

"I know. Once, when I had fewer years than thou hast now, I drank the same cup—to the very dregs I drank it. This is a sorrowful gate through which girlhood passes to womanhood and wifehood; and there is no key to open it but one—renunciation. I had to use it, my child."

"Poor moeder!"

"And I had no moeder to pity and to help me. I drank it alone, in secret, in the dark night hours. Like thee I thought my heart would break. But no. Good hearts do not break. When they suffer they grow strong, and at last the head bows, and the heart says, 'Dear God, thy will be done.' And God's will was thy father, who has been always to me an angel of goodness. Then thy brother Arent came to make me happy, and afterward thyself to be my pride and joy and dear delight. Now tell me, what can I do to comfort thee?"

"Could thou speak to Joris, mother, and tell him it was all my father's doing? If thou would only say to him, 'Virginia loves thee, Joris, and very soon she will explain all.'"

"These things I could not do. Think once, and thou will not ask me."

"Moeder, I hate Batavius. I hate him!"

"I understand. Yesterday he was so hateful. So full of himself. So conceited. Every one, even the dominie and thy father, had to give way to him."

"His kiss burns my lips. No water will wash them clean again, and when I think of Joris——"

"Well, then, Joris is handsome. Though he had been riding all the day he looked bold and brave, and full of fire."

"And oh, moeder, he has a face so good and so beautiful!"

"I have said that."

"And his heart is true and loving."

"I doubt it not. When he spoke to thee, it was with anger, but his eyes were full of love and pity."

"How can I help loving him, moeder?"

"Yet thou must conquer thy love. He will never see thee again. I think he will go to England at once. And when thou art married it will be a great sin to think of him. Let that help thee to forget."

"No, it will not help me. I shall never forget. How can father be so cruel?"

"Not cruel is he. No, indeed! He loves thee more than his own life. Listen to me. Thy father has some trouble in his heart. When he dies it will be in a moment. Before that moment comes, he wants to see thee in thy own home. I have told thee this because I would not have thy father fall dead at thy feet in some disputing."

"Moeder, the bread and milk has done me good. Must I marry Batavius? Is there no way out of it?"

"I see none. For thy father's sake what can thou do?"

"Anything, but marry Batavius. I will give up Joris—O wee! O wee!"

"Joris has given thee up. He is out of thy life."

"When I tell him all——"

"He will say to thee, thou art a coward, a woman without spirit. Remember what he proposed to thee. He thought thou ought to give up father, mother, home for him. And he will not forgive that kiss."

"What must I do?"

"In a right spirit, what thou hast just done. Ask God to guide thee. If he interfere, thy father and all of us will know it is his interference, and that would end the trouble. With the whole heart, then, say, 'Unto thee, O God, I commit my way.'"

THREE GREAT MEN AND A MUTUAL FRIEND

SIR Gilbert Parker, Hall Caine and Max Pemberton, as well as famous clergymen, professors, physicians, etc., found for a worn-down brain and nervous system nothing equalled the remarkable results obtained from the use of

Sanatogen
THE FOOD-TONIC

SIR GILBERT PARKER, the popular Canadian novelist:

"I have used Sanatogen at intervals since last autumn with extraordinary benefit. It is to my mind a true food tonic, feeding the nerves, increasing the energy, and giving fresh vigor to the overworked body and mind."

HALL CAINE, the dramatist:

"My experience of Sanatogen has been that as a tonic nerve food it has on more than one occasion benefited me."

MAX PEMBERTON, the distinguished editor and author, says:

"I beg to say that I have been taking your Sanatogen since the beginning of the year, and would not be without it under any circumstances whatever."

For all nervous disorders—insomnia, neurasthenia, indigestion, restlessness, continual fatigue, etc.,—Sanatogen is the logical food-remedy. It combines Albumen—milk's nutritive element—and Sodium Glycero-phosphate—the great brain and nerve builder. Sanatogen has the written endorsement of 12,000 physicians, including some of the highest medical authorities of the world.

Write for Dr. C. W. Saleeby's Book, "The Will To Do."

It is very interesting reading and contains some vital points about the nervous system and its relation to your every-day health that you ought to know. Dr. Saleeby's international reputation as a writer and thinker is your assurance that it is a book worth while writing for.

Her Easter Blessing

ONCE a sweet and simple maiden
Longed the Master's face to see.
"He will come with blessings laden,
Surely one will leave for me."
How her heart was filled with gladness!
He would hear her pleading cry,
Filled with mingled joy and sadness:
"Bless me as thou passest by."

Long she waited, prayed, and listened
For His step along the way,
Till at last He brought her mission
On a joyful Easter day.
Spoke with loving words the Master,
And his face was fair to see:
"Follow Me"—her tears fell faster—
"Take thy cross and follow me."

Gently was His blessing given;
Could she call it all a loss?
Bond that drew her nearer heaven,
Jesus' blessing was a cross.
So she covered it with flowers,
Lilies pure as whitest snow,
Planning how through all the hours
Sweetness from her life should grow.

Dr. Klopsch during his busy lifetime. The funeral arrangements were in charge of Mr. P. W. Radcliffe, manager of the Stephen Merritt Burial Company, under whose excellent supervision everything moved with admirable precision.

The floral decorations were exceedingly large and varied. Among them were wreaths, pillars and crosses, sent by the following: The President and Mrs. Taft, the New York Consistory, the Bowery Mission, the Brooklyn Tabernacle Association, Mrs. J. Greener Hallimond, Mrs. Joseph Keppler, Mrs. Percy B. Bromfield, Mr. Otto Koenig, Mr. and Mrs. Percy Rushmore Bromfield, August Luchow, the Lovejoy Company, the Brooklyn Tabernacle Sunday School Association, Mr. and Mrs. W. Atlee Burpee, Leon C. Weinstock, the Gospel Settlement Residents, I. H. Rosenfeld, Leopold Molnar, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Office Staff, the Construction Department and Editorial and Executive Department.

His Last Resting Place

Dr. Klopsch's remains were conveyed by rail to Tarrytown-on-the-Hudson. Interment will take place in the picturesque cemetery at Sleepy Hollow. For a number of years past Dr. Klopsch has made his summer home in Tarrytown, in a house overlooking the Hudson and commanding a view of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home on the farther side. It was his favorite benevolence, and on many a bright summer morning his first thought on arising was to look across the river at Mont-Lawn, which he could see on the heights beyond. He could tell whether the flag was flying, and whether all was right with the hundreds of little waifs who were in his care, and whom he visited almost every day, from July to September. It was one of his last wishes that his grave should be chosen in a site that would overlook the Hudson and command a view of his dearly-loved Children's Home, and that wish will now be faithfully carried out. There he sleeps, until the last trumpet sounds.

MESSAGES OF SYMPATHY

TELEGRAMS and letters of sympathy to the number of hundreds have been received from all parts of the country at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices, and at Dr. Klopsch's late home. All of these convey the sincerest condolences. President Taft's message from Washington, which was accompanied by a great floral wreath, is given in another column.

Baron Uchida, Japanese Ambassador, telegraphed to Mrs. Klopsch from Washington: "I am much grieved to learn of the death of your distinguished husband. Please accept my deepest sympathy and sincere condolences."

Rear-Admiral Charles D. Sigsbee telegraphed: "Deepest sympathy for you and yours in this great sorrow."

Miss Mabel Boardman, of the American Red Cross, telegraphed: "His death is a loss to humanity."

America's leading evangelist, Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, telegraphed: "Am deeply grieved to hear of the death of Dr. Klopsch. The world has lost a great man, and suffering humanity a good friend."

President Stooksbury, of Lincoln University, telegraphed: "Dr. Klopsch has joined General Howard above. We feel very keenly this loss."

Mr. Paget Baxter, proprietor of the Christian Herald, of London, cabled to Mrs. Klopsch: "Coming so soon after the death of my dear father, we deeply sympathize with you and your bereaved ones in your great sorrow. May God uphold you."

Mr. Willett F. Cook, the well-known publisher, wrote: "It comes to me as a personal sorrow, as I frequently met him and discussed work in the field. A great oak has fallen! We will not soon see his like again."

Mr. Edwin S. Ives, of Little & Ives Co., New York, wrote: "Surely he was a world benefactor; his fertile brain was always evolving plans for the good of humanity. We have enjoyed his friendship for years, and have become acquainted with many of his inner thoughts, and in those choice moments, when he was almost inspired with working out the problems of some of his great future achievements, we realized that the Christ was in him in complete control, and his face was illumined by an expression almost like that of the Master whom he so faithfully served. How the children will miss him! How everybody will miss him! It has many a time been an inspiration to the writer to meet him. Sometimes we would call just to take advantage of the contagion of his enthusiasm. We cannot express the deep sorrow at such a loss."

Superintendent J. H. Wyburn, of the McAuley Mission, New York, wrote: "Rescue work and workers have lost a tried, true friend, and the men who are 'down and out' a faithful, true helper."

Mr. Edgar H. Cottrell, president of the famous press building firm of Cottrell & Sons' Company, wrote: "The passing of such a man is more than a personal loss; it is a loss to mankind."

"A Shining Light Gone Out"

Mr. E. Gottschalk, the well-known art dealer of New York, wrote: "To know him was to admire, honor and respect him, for surely 'all in all he was a man.' That the literary and charitable world has lost one of its shining lights is but too apparent."

Mr. W. E. Derry, Dover, N. Y., telegraphed: "Thank God for Louis Klopsch! His memory is a great inheritance to his children."

Rev. Frank De Witt Talmage telegraphed from Philadelphia: "All Christendom sympathizes. Dr. Klopsch was an international power of Gospel evangelism."

Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, author of In His Steps, of Topeka, Kan., wrote: "Dr. Klopsch was a good friend of mine, and I have been indebted in many ways to him on account of his practical and hearty assistance, granted at many different times to my Social Settlement work here in Topeka. The loss is extended throughout a large circle. He is a man who will be missed here on earth by very many personal friends, of whom I count myself one."

County Sheriff John S. Shea, of New York, wrote: "I am extremely sorry to hear of the death of your beloved father. In this sad hour of your bereavement and great loss I extend to you my sincere sympathy."

Mr. Archibald McCowan wrote from Stamford, Conn.: "My sincere hope is that his good work will be taken in hand by some worthy successor. Great business ability, combined with great philanthropy, is not by any means an ordinary combination. Louis Klopsch is the only man I have ever known who possessed both."

Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, of Washington, D. C., wrote: "It has been said by Carlyle, I think, that the deepest test of greatness is the range of a man's sympathies. By this test, Dr. Louis Klopsch measures up to the standard of the world's foremost group, the international men, whose sympathy leaps all arbitrary boundaries among men—all national and denominational and social and race boundaries—and grasps

"GAUZRIB"
The newest of the new Something entirely new. The most unique and stylish underwear ever made. In quality, fit and finish "Gauzrib" is "the newest of the new" in lingerie.

"Gauzrib" is exclusive. It is unlike any other underwear, anywhere, at any price. We are originators of both machines and fabric, and we know. It is finer, softer and more delightfully glove-fitting than any other. And it is durable. You can launder it again and again

"Gauzrib" is just full of elasticity. It gives with every movement of the body. It is the finest, smoothest, silkiest underwear fabric ever made. The undervest you see above—a size five—fitting a 40 and 42 bust, will stretch to nearly 60 inches, and yet so fine, sheer and filmy is it that you can pass it through a wedding-ring as illustrated. Think of it!

HAND-MADE LACE FINISH

The superb "Gauzrib" finish is something to take your breath away. Real hand-crocheted lace, every stitch of it—costing in itself more than you pay for the average undervest. There is nothing like "Ganzrib" anywhere.

These statements are made by a reliable company and are truthful. "Gauzrib" Underwear for women is made by the makers of Cooper's celebrated "Spring Needle" Underwear for men, the kind you see advertised so often. The machines which make the "Ganzrib" fabric are just perfected.

Cooper's "Gauzrib" Underwear is not yet for sale at your dealers. It is too new for that. But you can secure the "Gauzrib" Undervests from us direct by ordering quickly. The price is $2.00 each, charges prepaid, and they are worth it. Send check or money order at once, if you would make sure of your order being filled. Our present output is limited. SPEND $6.50=GET A MODERN BATHROOM!

At Last! Modern bathing facilities without running water, water works or plumbing. New invention solves problem. Costs but $6.50 complete with heater---yet actually gives bathing facilities.

Sectional View

EQUAL TO MOST LAVISHLY EQUIPPED BATHROOM

Unlike anything you've ever heard of. Used wherever water exists in any room, any part of the house. So energizes and distributes water that very little does more than tub-full old way. Combines in one bath, one operation, one cost, the properties of four baths---cleansing, friction, massage and shower, plus shampoo. Hot or cold---any temperature---any time --- any place. Adapted for all members of the family --- no difference. One Texas user writes: "Children cry for it." Makes bathing 5 minute operation---longer if preferred---every minute a pleasure. Cleanses and operates almost automatically. No tubs, bowls or buckets to fill---no washrags, cloths or sponges---no dirt, odor, splashing, or muss. Banishes drudgery before, during, and after bathing.

See how simple, easy, convenient: To bathe, just do this --- place self-heating fountain on wall---fill with water---touch a match, turn regulator---that's all. Thereafter, it energizes and works automatically. Just think! Only clean, running, energized water touches body---no immersion---no using same water twice. What a pleasure---what a bath---what a boon to humanity! All hardship, drudgery, annoyance, wiped out. Could anything be more perfect? Sounds too good to be true, yet it's no experiment. Over 100,000 sold. USED BY U. S. GOVERNMENT, famous Battle Creek Sanitarium, and other celebrated authorities. Guaranteed by a $50,000. house. Not sold in stores. Sent anywhere. Send no money, but do investigate. Let us prove these claims---refer you to nearby users. Get our personal trial offer, catalogue, testimonials---all free. Just risk 1 cent---a postal---to get acquainted.

the hand of every man who needs help for body or soul, or desires to help others, counting the whole world one neighborhood and one brotherhood."

Francis Trevelyan Miller, editor of the Journal of American History, wrote from Hartford, Conn.: "Dr. Klopsch was undoubtedly the greatest inspirational force in the Christian homes of America. He had gathered about him a great brotherhood. It was more than a quarter million American homes, and he united them into one of the greatest moral powers in the nation. His work will live for generations. This service to humanity seems to me to be of greater import than his magnificent work as 'almoner of nations in distress,' although the latter made him one of the world's benefactors. Dr. Klopsch should take his place as one of the historic figures in the annals of civilization, as his life was spent for the uplift of humanity, through the furtherance of the great spirit of Christian brotherhood."

"The Friend of the Friendless"

Orison S. Marden, editor of Success, wrote: "He was a man of many sterling qualities. Few men have touched such a vast number of lives in such a practical way. Tens of thousands have been made better and happier because he lived. What a friend the vast multitudes of people scattered all over the earth have lost! What an army of children will mourn his death! He was always a friend of the friendless and the unfortunate."

John Brisben Walker, the well-known publisher, wrote: "To few men is it given to keep steadily in mind the welfare of the millions while pursuing their daily work. To Dr. Klopsch popular reward meant simply more power to do good. He maintained at all times a parallel plane of charities and kindnesses of the widest extent."

Mr. Cyrus Curtis, proprietor of the Ladies' Home Journal, wrote: "My sympathy is deep and sincere, having been through the same experience. May your heart be comforted."

Mr. Simon Brentano, the well-known New York publisher, wrote: "Dr. Klopsch was always a most welcome visitor. We knew him and esteemed him greatly for his fine qualities."

Mr. W. B. Howland, treasurer of the Outlook, wrote: "He was my good friend, and I shall miss him. His work for humanity is his most impressive monument."

Consul-Gen. Hanna's Tribute

United States Consul-General Hanna telegraphed from Monterey, Mexico: "I am grieved beyond expression to learn of the sudden death of Dr. Louis Klopsch. He stood faithfully by me during the Porto Rican disaster. He was one of the first to come to the rescue in relieving the thousands of flood and frost sufferers. In northern Mexico his work will never be forgotten. I have placed my flag at half-mast, in token of the great man who has done so much for the poor in this locality. Please convey my deepest sympathy to his family."

Baron Ozawa, the head of the Imperial Red Cross of Japan, cabled from Tokyo, as follows: "Deepest sorrow for Dr. Klopsch's death. Express sympathy to Mrs. Klopsch."

Mr. Will R. Moody, head of the Northfield Moody Schools, telegraphed to Mrs. Klopsch from Atlanta: "May the God of all comfort be your solace in this dark hour."

Evangelist Len G. Broughton telegraphed from Atlanta: "The Tabernacle Bible Conference, composed of several hundred Christian workers and ministers, express deepest sympathy."

Among others from whom messages of heartfelt sympathy were received were the following: Joe Mitchell Chappell, editor National Magazine, Boston; Geo. A. Warburton; Hon. R. Watchorn, ex-Commissioner of Immigration.

Training Missionaries in Temperance

THAT the missionary must be taught in Gospel temperance is a fact now generally recognized. In India, China, Burma, South Africa and Japan the plan of scientific temperance instruction has had a cordial greeting from the governments of these respective lands, and petitions for its introduction into the school systems are being widely circulated. Temperance teaching has been begun in the mission schools.

The Chicago Training School for City, Home and Foreign Missions is among the first of training schools to recognize this fact by adopting a definite course of temperance education for its students. This course is a model one, similar to those designated for the secular normal schools, colleges and universities.

There are four general divisions in the course, which covers a period of about four months' study. These groups include studies in Alcoholism, Temperance, Pedagogy, the Political and Economic Aspect of the Liquor Problem, and Corrective Agencies. The first covers the effects of alcohol not only on the physical organism, but also on mental operations, community welfare and morals, pauperism and crime, public health, family and neighborhood conditions, the effects of alcohol upon the alimentary tract, the circulatory system and the various organs.

These prospective missionaries also study the political and economic aspect of the liquor problem, giving special attention to the consideration of the saloon in politics, the brewer in municipal politics, liquor legislation, Federal and State regulation and prohibition, local option, the economic advantages of prohibition as related to employment of capital, the relations between capitalists and wage-earners, national revenues, etc.

The work is in charge of a teacher who has personally investigated field conditions, and she is aided by a corps of temperance experts which includes Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens and Miss Anna R. Gordon, president and vice-president at large of the National W. C. T. U.; Professor W. I. Thomas, University of Chicago; Dr. W. A. Evans, chief Chicago Department of Health; Arthur Burrage Farwell, president Chicago Law and Order League; Mrs. Mary J. Teats, superintendent School of Gospel Eugenics; Miss Mary McDowell, head Chicago University Settlement, and Mrs. Edith Smith Davis, World's and National W. C. T. U., superintendent scientific temperance instruction.

A special feature of the course is the plan for a study of Chicago as a typical city, with respect to liquor and immorality. Instructors in the Training School's department of social service personally conduct the tours of investigation. A knowledge of anatomy, physiology, psychology and eugenics is a requisite, naturally, for the student who desires this expert temperance training, by which, as is plainly to be seen, the efficiency of the missionary, either in home or foreign service, is greatly augmented.

TEMPERANCE NOTES

—THE next State Fair of Michigan will be "dry," the administration having decided that no liquor shall be sold on the grounds.

—SINCE Waterloo, Ind., went "dry" the town marshal has resigned and entered the railway service, there being no business and no arrests for him to make. The criminal calendar is a blank.

—SINCE Rockford, Ill., went "dry" the town has prospered. The population has risen from 40,000 to 50,000 since 1908, property values have greatly increased, and arrests for drunkenness have decreased from 338 to 224.

—MARK TWAIN has found a new reason for opposing prohibition. He writes: "They have just invented a method of making brandy out of sawdust! Now, what chance will prohibition have when a man can take a ripsaw and go out and get drunk with a fence rail? What is the good of prohibition if a man is able to make brandy mashes out of the shingles on his roof, or if he can get the delirium tremens by drinking the legs off the kitchen table?"

—GEORGE ELLIOT HOWARD, in an article in McClure's, has this paragraph: "That the sources of the divorce movement are bad social conditions, which may be remedied, is illustrated by the sinister fact that, directly or indirectly, 184,568 divorces, or nearly 20 per cent. of the whole number reported for the last two decades, were granted for intemperance; and in nine-tenths of these cases the culprit was the man."

Chats With the Young Folks

By Kate Upson Clark

Easter in France

THE newspapers have told us of the great religious revolution in France. The government decided that church and state must be wholly separated. The religions of the French were so various that it was deemed best that no notice should be taken of any of them by the government.

The matter even went so far that the religious holidays of Christmas, Easter, All Saints' Day and the Assumption were voted away.

Then, as you can imagine, a great outcry went up from the people. They insisted that they must have their holidays.

"Very well," the government decided, "you may have them, but you must not call them by the old religious names. Christmas shall be called 'The Family Festival.' The Feast of the Assumption shall be called 'The Harvest Festival,' the Feast of All Saints 'The Memorial Festival,' and Easter 'The Spring Flower Festival.'"

Let us rejoice that in our Christian land the dear old names commemorating incidents in the life of our Lord will always be retained.

What Was It?

ONE of the most successful of New York's great merchants testifies that the foundation of his success, as that of so many others, was laid in the most unremitting work in the early days of his career.

"Long after my clerks had gone I used to stay to look over the books and examine the stock," he says. "Generally I would go home to dinner, but sometimes I would snatch a hasty meal at some nearby restaurant, and then return to the store to work until midnight.

"I had heard tales of the burglars who haunted that part of the town after business hours, but I was naturally fearless, and I kept a loaded revolver in the upper drawer of my desk, so that I did not worry. Still, I learned, after the first few years of my business life, that I had better drop the shades in my office when I worked there evenings, alone. Sometimes I had to leave the safe open for a while, with a good deal of money in it. Even a courageous man knows that a thief, watching him through an unshaded window, might call confederates and overpower him at such a time.

"It wasn't the fashion then to have night watchmen. Only a few had them on our street. It was probably some years after the occurrence I am about to relate that we had them ourselves.

"The books had got into a tangle, as books so often will, and I was staying late to straighten them out. The store was deathly still. I was adding and subtracting so hard that I had not noticed a peculiar noise which suddenly struck on my ear. Then I had a dim consciousness that I had been hearing that noise for some time.

"I dropped everything and listened. The clock struck midnight, and drowned everything. Then the silence began again—stiller than ever—and breaking in upon it, after a little, I heard the noise.

"Stealthy, muffled footsteps were making it, I felt sure. I stepped to the door and looked up the stairway.

"'Who's there?' I called gruffly.

"Naturally there was no response, but the noise stopped.

"I listened for a few minutes. Nothing happened.

"'It must have been something outside,' I muttered, like the hero of 'The Raven.'

"I stepped to the door and looked bravely up and down the street. Not a sign of life was there. I was probably the only man within a radius of half a mile—a space occupied only a few hours before with many thousands of busy workers. There was something uncanny in the thought of the contrast. I locked the door sharply and hurried inside. Even my firm nerves were shaken a little.

"I began again on the books, when, presto! there was the noise again—slow, stealthy steps—peculiar steps. No ordinary man was making them. Had some crafty lunatic obtained access to my store, hidden himself till the men had gone and now come out to rob or burn?

"I wanted to run away. In the distance I heard the bell of the old horse-car which I sometimes took. It ran once an hour, after midnight, all night. But I decided to stay and beat out my enemy.

"My hand shook a little as I lighted the lantern we always kept at hand in the office. Then I tramped up the four pairs of stairs and looked into and under everything on the upper floors. Nothing there!

"Within the next two hours I kept hearing the strange noise again and again. Three times I made the weary round of my entire store. The books were forgotten by this time. I thought only of that noise. What was it?

"As I was coming down the third time, I stopped to rest and to think over the situation at the head of the second staircase, from which I could plainly see the one which led to the floor above.

"I sat perfectly still for ten minutes or more and fell into a doze, for by this time I was completely tired out. Suddenly a sound near me made me open my eyes.

"I looked upward, and there was a big rat, holding in his mouth a roll, which some clerk had probably dropped from his lunch. As the rat could not carry the roll, he was coming backward down the stairs, pulling it down after him. What I had heard was the tap, tap of the roll as it dropped from one stair to another. He must have brought it from the very top of the house.

"I remembered noticing that roll, in a corner of the stairs, and was going to scold the janitor about it. So that was my burglar—or my ghost, as I had come to think it might be.

"Don't allow yourself to be scared by unaccountable noises," the wise old merchant concluded. "Ten to one your burglar or your ghost is only a rat."

Our Shorthand Classes

MANY readers have written recently desiring information regarding the Shorthand Correspondence Classes. To these, and to all others interested, we would state that the classes, which are now in their third year, having already taught successfully over 1,400 pupils, are now open for enrolment of members for the Spring Course. The system taught is Pitman-Graham, the standard system of the business world. The complete course consists of 24 graded lessons by mail, each lesson being self-explanatory and easily acquired by pupils of any age. Hundreds of former pupils are now occupying good positions. Every lesson is revised by individual instructors and lesson blanks are furnished to all students. The usual fee has been reduced to $2 (which covers all expenses) for Christian Herald readers and their friends. Full name and address should accompany application for enrolment. Address The Christian Herald, 92 Bible House, New York City.

Guaranteed Advertising

UR advertising guarantee is proving highly successful. This is denced by the number of letters ich we have received, commending r attitude or calling our attention to sunderstandings between subscribs and advertisers.

In this connection we have unthed and adjusted a number of fferences which might never have en adjusted had they not been ought to our attention. We have nd that in many cases subscribers ve answered advertisements, have en dissatisfied, and have remained ent rather than demand their rights, til they saw our guarantee. Then y wrote to us about it. In every se we have brought the matter to e attention of the advertiser, and satisfactory conclusion has been ached. In some cases the purchaser d not understand how to operate the paratus he had purchased; in others, thing had been heard from the adrtiser, due, as we found, to miscarge of the mails. Again we found at parts of an instrument were miss, and so it would not work until the vertiser had furnished the missing rts.

Of course, the subscriber should try st to adjust any difference directly th the advertiser, but when this ls to bring satisfaction, by all means ite to us and we will do our best to e that the spirit as well as the letter our guarantee is lived up to. Have u read it?

Whenever any of our subscribers is frauded by an advertiser in THE RISTIAN HERALD we will make good e claim, provided that the subscriber, o must be of record, has mentioned HE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to e advertiser, and provided the claim made to us within one month of the te of the appearance of the advertement.

Solid Oak Box Seat DINING CHAIRS $1.95 Each

These Solid Oak Box Seat Dining Chairs are made of specially selected oak, with quarter sawed backs, in rich golden gloss finish. The seats are full size and upholstered with genuine No. 1 leather, fitted perfectly to the seat frame and trimmed with gimp and black enameled tacks. The handsomely shaped legs are mortised and doweled to the seat frame and firmly braced by square stretchers. The fact that we are quoting the hitherto unheard of price of $1.95 each on these first class dining chairs is possible because we contracted with the largest box seat chair factories in this country for 10,000 of these chairs at the lowest possible factory cost, and we are giving our customers the benefit of our special purchases by saving them at least one-third in price.

Send us your order for as many of these chairs as you need in your dining room. Examine them closely and let your friends do the same, and if you do not find them fully equal to chairs generally sold at $3.00 to $3.25 each, we want you to return the chairs to us and let us return your money, including any transportation charges you may have paid. Order by number.

Among the Workers

—YOUNGSTOWN, O., population 75,000, been shaken to its centre by a revival, w has brought hundreds into the churches.

—THE SUNDAY Evening Club of Chicag an organization which includes many lea business men, and meets every Sunday eve for evangelistic services, which are largely tended.

—EVANGELIST HENRY OSTROM is leading a vival in Brockton, Mass., which is full of pr ise. Rev. J. W. Mahood, Rev. A. B. Davi and Rev. Julian S. Wadsworth, D.D., are a ciated in the movement; the latter is chair of the campaign.

—THE GENERAL COUNCIL of Evangelical sions in Korea prayed this year for the con sion of a million souls in that country, namcd March 20 as a day of prayer for "Hermit Land." Christians everywhere are vited to assist.

—THE CO-OPERATO HOME, for girls ear small wages, is located at No. 444 W Twenty-third Street, New York City. It been full during the past year, having a pacity of forty-four occupants. It is supporting, and deserving of encouragemen —MISSIONARY F. J. SMITH, of Peniel Miss Progreso, Yucatan, Mexico, writes of great pel meetings among the Maya Indians of State. The population is 312,264, and greater part have no knowledge of Jesus Saviour. Buildings and workers are urge needed.

—EVANGELISTS DAVIS and Mills have concluded a wonderfully successful campaig Sherburne, N. Y. Many have been conve and the churches have been greatly quicke The work was extended to include Earls and Norwich, where similar good results v realized.

—REV. J. G. MULLOWNEY, of the M. E. sion, Peking, writes that there is great nee a hospital for the treatment of nervous mental diseases in North China. At pre such patients are treated by the Chinese prisoners, many of them being held in cha Such an institution, he writes, must be in pendent and non-sectarian, and would $30,000. He adds: "Here is a splendid op tunity for people of means who want to to a non-sectarian, humanitarian, Christian practical service."

—THE FAIRBANKS incident continues to l leading topic in Rome. Rev. B. W. Tipple Sunday, February 27, preached on the sub of "The Methodists in Rome." He said the church was meeting with great succes Italy. It is in Rome under the Italian la which guarantee religious freedom. The cha that the church was proselyting was fool Its hands are filled in dealing with unbeliev The last census showed Italy to have the lar number of people without any religious pro sion of any country in Europe. He de absolutely that any dishonorable methods w employed in making converts.

—SINCE THE arrival of the Rev. Dr. Art Muston, president of the missionary work the Waldensian Church in Italy, and of Pro sor Giorgio Bartoli, these eminent workers h addressed large audiences in a number of cit including Philadelphia, Germantown, Prin ton, New York, Syracuse, etc., and have ranged to speak in many other places throu out the country. They will return to Italy May. There are in New York City over th hundred Waldensians from Piedmont, It and these have organized a union for religi and social purposes. A pastor from their country will be installed shortly.

—CHRIS. J. BALF, a rescue mission wor now in Chicago, writes: "I was converted November 25, 1908. After serving God to best of my ability, in all the missions in N York City, particularly the McAuley and B ery Missions, I was enabled through the ki ness of Mr. S. T. Clay, a member of Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, and J. H. Wyburn, formerly superintendent the Bowery Mission, to come to Chicago take up a course in the Moody Bible Instit Since I came here He has seen fit to bles large number of "down-and-out" men thro me; three men in particular—a forger, a l glar, and a highwayman. After talking to forger, he pulled two forged checks out of pocket and tore them up. The burglar w into the mission to keep off the street till could 'kick in a jewelry store.' He heard testimony of what God had done for me. weeks after, he came to me in the mission said: 'I thank God for ever meeting you!' was going home to his mother. The highw man also became a reformed man, and is earning an honest living."

—MISSIONARY E. W. JANSEN writes f Cebu, P. I.: "During the recent terrible cl era epidemic in Cebu God wonderfully up the faith of his people. So great was the pa of the terror-stricken citizens that at one t none could he found willing to bury those had died of cholera, and eventually the pris ers were compelled to do so, until the cemet employees could get sufficient graves dug meet the appalling demand. The reign of ror seemed to grip the Cebuans so that m sickened and died through fear alone, but had the joy of seeing almost all our fell Christians upheld hy restful faith in G There are many Christian young men here, v long for the opportunity to receive training evangelistic work. Nine years ago, when Manila, a seeker from another island directed to me. Finding that he needed a cle print Testament, I gave him my own. Si then I had heard nothing of seeker or Tes ment. But one of our trained workers fr Cebu, having been sent to a far-off and nee mission field in these islands, the seeker of n years ago was met with. The man h through reading God's Word, become a Ch tian, and with him all his family, and he been helping others. After all these years had the joy of seeing the fruit of a small d of service to an unknown seeker."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

A Notable Life*

ALL those who, a quarter of a century or more ago, thrilled and shuddered over Queechy and The Wide, Wide World will enjoy this quaint and unconventional biography of their author. It is far too minute and wordy to satisfy the literary requirements of the present day, but in its very Pre-Raphaelitism lies its charm. Surely few extant descriptions so well picture for us the life of well-to-do country families in the middle of the last century. The letters and journals quoted remind one of those of Jane Austen, though there is little enough resemblance between her books and those of Susan Warner. Miss Warner's scorn for the innocent game, "What is my thought like?" her frank dependence upon coffee, "two cups of which tinted life with rose color"; her unexpected enthusiasm over music; her uncertainty as to whether or not she ought to take champagne, fashion and principle waging their immemorial fight in her, as in many others; and the thousand other glimpses into a rare, original character, make this book not only entertaining, but much more. The illustrations shed light upon Susan Warner's native and inherited traits, and are highly interesting. They, and for that matter the whole book, make one feel as though the present estimate of her works were too low, and as though she ought to have produced real, lasting literature; which, indeed, they may turn out yet to be.

How the Farmer Controls the Cost of Living

THE cost of living depends on the volume and cost of production. The farmer can determine only partially the amount nature will permit her soil to produce, but he can regulate the cost of his crop by the machines he uses in tilling and harvesting.

The markets of the world are now watching for the results of the grain harvest of the farmers of America. Prepare properly against delays and waste and you will reap rich reward.

The responsibility for wasted grain and profits rests with you.

Choose your harvesting equipment—make your selection before the rush comes—take no chances—avoid experiments either in machines or binder twine.

From experience hundreds of thousands of farmers endorse the adaptability of the I H C line of harvesting machines.

Champion McCormick Osborne Deering Milwaukee Plano

Hundreds of thousands of farmers, hard-headed business men, with the same problems that confront you, have had their problems solved by some one of these machines. They didn't buy because they were prejudiced in their favor - they bought because they were convinced that these machines represented the highest standard of excellence in harvesting-machine construction, because these machines met their requirements, because they thought they were getting the greatest return on their investment.

The experimental period has passed, and efficiency, durability, simplicity, dependability and absolutely interchangeable parts are now at your order. Improvements in time and labor-saving features, finer materials, more skilled and painstaking workmanship are now strictly carried out in the manufacture of these six lines of machines, so that all element of risk on your part is eliminated.

With any machine in the I H C line you are safe—for smooth, rapid, uninterrupted, perfect work at harvest time.

Materials, workmanship and quickly available interchangeable I H C parts are backed by the most responsible and trustworthy guarantee in the farm-machine world today. Such perfection would not be possible if the manufacturer did not have available ore mines, steel mills, timber lands and saw mills so as to make sure of the raw materials, and if the buying power and large output did not insure the first choice of raw materials from all other sources—and the ability to employ the right men to work up these materials, and to furnish these men with the most perfect facilities in the world—all this is of equal importance to you. It is these resources, insuring the highest degree of efficiency in every machine turned out, that means the lessening of your responsibility at harvest time, the elimination of most all the risk, the freedom from anxiety and worry and discouragement. Profit by the experience of hundreds of thousands of others who reap all their harvests and all the profit with one of the six leading machines. See the International dealer at once. Take your choice. The quality is the same in all—the best possible. The lines include grain and corn harvesting machines, haying machines and tools.

From the I H C dealer you can get repairs that fit when repairs are needed. Repairs having the I H C standard of excellence can be secured at almost every cross roads or village. This availability is not only a great convenience, but also saves valuable time, which means money to the busy farmer in case of accident in the harvest field.

Don't experiment with binder twine, either. Get one of the seven perfectly dependable brands of twine and be sure. Choose Champion, McCormick, Osborne, Deering, Milwaukee, Plano or International in Sisal, Standard, Manila and Pure Manila brands.

If it is not convenient to see an International dealer, write for full information and the catalogue you want.

LEARN DRESSMAKING AT HOME BY MAIL

We Will Teach You To Your Own Satisfaction

MANY women nowadays are earning $100 a week—$5,000 a year by dressmaking. One woman, the head designer in Chicago's largest retail dry goods house, is said to receive $10,000 a year. Salaries of $25.00 to $50.00 a week are common. Graduate dressmakers are wanted right now in many good towns and cities. Never before has there been such a demand for competent designers. We teach you by mail and equip you to command a good income. Or you can start in business for yourself. Become a Graduate Dressmaker. The regular diploma of this College is issued to all who complete this course of lessons. The American System is most thorough and complete in every detail, and yet very simple and easily understood. These lessons will teach you how to Design, Draft, Cut, Fit, Make, Drape and Trim any garment, including children's clothing. This study will not interfere with your regular duties. This College is endorsed by leading high-grade fashion magazines—McCall's, Harper's Bazar, Paris Modes, Fashions, Woman's World, Woman's Magazine, etc., etc.

Make Your Own Clothes

SAVE MONEY by drafting your own patterns, by doing your own sewing, and enable yourself to dress far better at one-third the usual cost.

SAVE TIME and the worry of having to wait on dressmakers in the busy season of each year.

What Are These Lessons Worth?

OUR STUDENTS SAY IN RECENT LETTERS:—"I would not exchange the knowledge I have gained for double the cost." "I would not take $50 for what I have learned." "I have made 25 waists (6 silk ones)—all perfect fits." "I have just saved the price of my course by making my own silk dress." "I have saved a large dressmakers' bill by doing my own sewing." "The knowledge gained from these lessons is enabling me to help my husband pay for our new home." "I would not sell this system for $100."

The Children's Dresses

Every mother wants her children to be well dressed. Many are not able to have the sewing done by a capable garment maker, and the ready made garments are far from satisfactory. Our system thoroughly covers the subject of designing, cutting and fitting children's clothing.

The Author of This Course

Our readers will be interested to learn of the signal success of a western woman who had the initiative to test a new and somewhat unique idea—teaching dressmaking by correspondence. Only a few years ago, Miss Pearl Merwin, now supervisor of the American College of Dressmaking, was modestly but successfully doing such sewing as came to her from her friends, as a natural result of the merits of her work. A college-bred woman herself, she conceived the idea of putting her knowledge and experience into the hands of those less favored, by crystallizing it into a series of lessons which could easily and successfully be taught by mail. She commenced advertising in a small way, until the practicability of the idea was fully demonstrated. Her advertising may now be seen in all of the leading magazines. She has over 20,000 students and graduates throughout the country, and the product of her pen is widely sought. She is a striking example of the new woman—not however, of the mannish sort—who has "come up out of the ranks" largely by her own efforts, and that by confining her work wholly within the generally conceded province of feminine endeavor.—Clipped from "HUMAN LIFE," published at Boston, Mass.

A Practical Demonstration

Miss Pearl Merwin, Supervisor. Dear Teacher:— BROWNSVILLE, VT.

I am very glad to have finished successfully the complete American System of Dressmaking, and want to thank you for your kindness and the interest you have taken in me.

When I started taking your lessons, they enabled me to make quite a number of things for myself and my friends, who were so well satisfied with my work that I took in all the sewing I could do, and did exceptionally well.

Since completing my course, I have started dressmaking and have been very successful, having made a silk shirt-waist suit, two skirts, two jackets and two fancy gowns, one of which I just completed today, and my customer is delighted with it. I appreciate the American System of Dressmaking very much.

After receiving my diploma I started on a large scale, taking in only the fancy and expensive gowns. Have made eight wedding dresses, and several bridesmaid dresses, reception and graduation gowns, etc. I recommend the American System of Dressmaking at every opportunity, and remain, your student,

Miss Emma J. Pierson.

FAIRBANK'S

Aids to Purity and Cleanliness

Fairy Soap

Fairy Soap looks and is whiter than any other soap; moreover, it will retain its whiteness long after other so-called white soaps have turned yellow.

Fairy Soap is made from edible products, and has a clean, delicate, refreshing smell; many other soaps have a strong, greasy, soapy—and, oft-times, rancid odor.

Fairy Soap is the best soap you can buy for the toilet and bath—no matter what you pay. Yet its price is but 5 cents.

Order Fairy Soap—the handy, floating, oval cake—to-day, and learn by use why it is the soap of soaps.

Fairy Soap was granted highest possible awards at both St. Louis and Portland Expositions.

"Have you a little 'Fairy' in your home?"

Gold Dust

Several so-called "washing powders" are only sal soda. You can buy sal soda at your grocer's under its real name for much less than you can these powders.

Others contain naphtha, ammonia or some other liquid cleanser which evaporates the moment the powder is exposed to the air.

Gold Dust is a true washing powder. It is a mixture of vegetable oil soap and purifying ingredients which insure prompt and efficient cleansing action It softens hard water, does its work quickly and well, and injures nothing. GOLD DUST will do more work and better work than any other washing powder on the market.

For washing dishes, scrubbing floors, cleaning woodwork, oilcloth, silverware and tinware, polishing brasswork, cleaning bathroom pipes, refrigerators, etc., softening hard water, washing clothes, and making the finest soft soap.

Sunny Monday

Laundry Soap

Most yellow soaps contain from 20 to 40 per cent. rosin. Sunny Monday *(N.R.) is white, and contains not an ounce of rosin. Which would you prefer to use on your clothes—a soap containing about one-third rosin (a cheapening ingredient) or Sunny Monday *(N.R.) wherein the cheap rosin element is replaced with expensive fats and vegetable oils.

Sunny Monday *(N.R.) does the work with scarcely any rubbing and actually does double the work of any yellow rosin soap. Its dirt-starting quality is permanent and lasts until the cake is worn to a wafer.

*N.R. means "No Rosin." Sunny Monday Laundry Soap contains no rosin. Rosin cheapens soap but injures clothes.

Questions and Answers

In forwarding MSS. to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, enclose stamped envelopes for return, if unavailable.

Mrs. P. E. V. H., Dover, Calif. 1. Was Jesus, in teaching the Lord's Prayer, doing so only for his disciples? 2. Is God the Father of Christians only, or of all humanity? 3. Is there a quotation in the Bible which says, "Things I once loved I now hate"?

1. Although it was spoken to his disciples, it was meant for all his followers for all time, and has been adopted by the Christian Church throughout the world. 2. He is the Father, Creator and Preserver of us all. In many places in the Scripture this fact is emphasized. 3. The quotation to which you probably refer is that in Rom. 7:15-18.

J. M. S., Butler, Pa. Is there any history of Paul being beheaded, and under what king?

The exact manner in which Paul met his death is not known. The question has been much discussed, and the early writers of the church wrote some about it. Dionysius, Bishop of Corinth, A.D. 170, says that Peter and Paul went to Italy, taught there, and suffered martyrdom at about the same time. Eusebius accepts the tradition that he was beheaded in Rome during the reign of Nero. The earliest reference to the death of the apostle is by Clemens Romanus, who writes: "Having gone to the boundary of the West, and testified before rulers, so he departed out of this world." But he fails to give any details in what manner Paul died. We are unable to answer the other question sent.

Mary B., Chillicothe, O. Is Mrs. Harriman or Hetty Green the richest woman in the United States?

It is doubtful who is the wealthiest woman. The figures given are only approximate. They are: Mrs. Harriman, $60,000,000 to $75,000,000; Mrs. Hetty Green, $100,000,000; Mrs. Russell Sage, $85,000,000; Mrs. Frederick C. Penfield, $60,000,000.

W. S., Alta, Calif. 1. Please explain Matt. 16:28. 2. What is meant by "thou fool!" in Matt. 5:22?

1. The preferable rendering of the passage would be "till they see the kingdom of God." Jesus no doubt meant to point out that in the lifetime of some of those present the new kingdom would be firmly established on earth in the hearts of men, which would ultimately reform the world. He was contrasting the old law of the Mosaic dispensation, which dealt with the visible offense, and the new law of the Gospel, which took jurisdiction of our most secret thoughts and feelings. He showed them that even causeless anger and lack of brotherly love were offenses in God's sight, as he is a judge who searches the hearts of men.

Mrs. C. A. Z., Manistee, Mich. Will you kindly tell me in which States it is unlawful for cousins to marry?

Marriage between first cousins is forbidden in Alaska, Arizona, California, Arkansas, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Missouri, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Washington.

Mrs. E. M., Upper Sandusky, O. Did Elijah go to heaven in a chariot of fire?

The account in II. Kings, chapter 2, says that he went up in a whirlwind (see verses 1 to 11). The fiery phenomenon symbolizes the translation, which appeared to the eyes of Elisha as a chariot of fire, with horses of fire, which parted the two prophets. Some scholars point out that angels are called "chariots," and are represented as such in mysterious fire (see Psalms 68:17; Ezek. 1:4-13, and also chapter 6). Dean Stanley holds that the prophet was carried off in a thunderstorm, which is narrated with Oriental vividness. Josephus, in his Antiquities, says: "Elijah disappeared from among men, and no one knows of his death to this very day." What is evident from the Biblical record is that he went up in a whirlwind—a storm accompanied with vivid fire.

A. W. G., Maine. A new Encyclopedia describes a Mount Hercules, situated on the island of Papua, or New Guinea, as the highest mountain in the world. Is this true?

Mount Everest, in North India, is supposed to be the highest mountain on the globe. It is 29,002 feet high.

B. P. B., St. Louis, Mo. 1. You say it is possible for a man to fall from grace. If this be true, what is the meaning of the verse, "He which hath begun a good work in you will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ"? 2. Is the Catholic Church a part of the Church of Christ? If so, why is it not represented at the Laymen's Missionary Movement?

1. We are told in Gal. 3:1, 5:4, Rev. 2:4, II.Thess.2:3; I. Tim. 4:1, and other passages, that there are those who backslide and fall from grace, and that such as have once known the truth and rejected it are in a more grievous

THE BOOK OF THE FUTURE LIFE

The Great Hereafter

By Rev. Madison C. Peters, D.D.

ACTUAL BOOK, WHEN OPEN, MEASURES 10 X 16 INCHES.

GLIMPSES OF THE COMING WORLD

From THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
Ex-President of the United States:

"I shall read The Great Hereafter with deep interest. I have looked over it enough to be able to tell something of its value, and it has to me the added value of knowing the life, and the strife after right, of the man who wrote it."

From GROVER CLEVELAND,
Ex-President of the United States:

"The Great Hereafter will not only have a place in my library, but will often be found in my hands, as a source of reinforcement of faith, exceedingly opportune in these days of loose thinking and careless teaching."

THIS remarkable book makes every reader see the beauties of the "Cloudless Land," where there is no more sorrow and pain, and where the inhabitant shall not say, "I am sick."

It was a stupendous undertaking to bring together in one volume the views of more than four hundred of the world's greatest thinkers upon the questions of the immortality of the soul and the Great Hereafter, but Dr. Peters possesses unusual qualifications for the task.

Some people picture Heaven as a beautiful country with rolling hills, winding streams, orchards of luscious fruit and meadows of living green. With others, it is a city of everlasting foundations, jasper walls and golden streets. The author of The Great Hereafter shows how these opposite conceptions may be harmonized.

The Occupations of the Blessed

"Is there any one who can carry his present employment into Heaven?" inquires a writer in a recent periodical. "The lawyer cannot, there will be no quarrels; the doctor cannot, there will be no sick; the preacher cannot, there will be no sinners." Dr. Peters explodes some false views of the subject, and gives some hints in regard to the nature of the employment in the "Better Land."

Our Friends In the Sorrowless Land

It is a book for everybody because everybody is interested in the themes discussed. Such questions as these continually rise to our lips: Where are our dead? Shall we know our friends in heaven? What is the occupation of our loved ones in the life beyond? Do they know what is going on in this world? Can they communicate with us? Is Spiritualism a safe guide? What is the state of the soul between death and the resurrection? Are there degrees of happiness and glory in heaven? What is the nature of the resurrection body? What do the dying often see?

The Testimony of Great Men

These fascinating but difficult questions the author has undertaken to answer. He has ransacked the great libraries and questioned the master spirits of humanity, until he has knit together in one compact volume the best the world has to say upon these great themes. From Socrates to Spurgeon, from pagan philosophers to Christian preachers, the long procession moves on, each distinguished witness asserting his belief in the Great Beyond.

As long as there are human griefs to be assuaged and human longings for another life, this noble book, The Great Hereafter, must find a place.

It is published by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is finely illustrated, and is bound in several attractive styles.

THE GREAT HEREAFTER is a Magnificent Volume, consisting of 600 Large Pages, measuring 8 by 10 Inches, Beautifully Printed on Very Heavy Paper, with Wide Margins, Very Large, Clear Type, and exquisitely bound in Cloth, Half-Leather, and Full Morocco. The "God House" of the Strange Tribe

The "Ark" of the Huichols

AN INDIAN STORY OF THE FLOOD

By LILLIAN E. ZEH

MR. CARL LUMHOLTZ, the well-known explorer, who has been traveling in Mexico making ethnological investigations, has visited and reported on a wonderful and almost practically unknown tribe of Indians. Many strange ceremonial and symbolic objects illustrating their peculiar customs were obtained, together with curious myths and traditions.

Among the latter is an interesting and remarkable legend, a new version of Noah's Ark and the flood. This new interpretation of the Deluge is not, of course, in keeping with the Biblical narrative, but is interesting nevertheless. These Indians hold that the Ark never rested on Ararat and that Noah was a Huichol Indian. His story is part of Huichol family history. His ark rested on one of the mountain tops of Central Mexico, and the flood was not one of forty days, but lasted five years.

It is really very curious, this Noah's ark legend of the Huichols, for they are a hermit people, and have kept to themselves for a generation or so. Mr. Lumholtz believes he is the first white man, certainly the first scientist, to penetrate and to live some time in their territory, thus gaining an insight into the life, habits, customs and wonderful symbolism of the people. There are some 4,000 of them, and they live in an almost inaccessible canyon, or narrow defile, in the Sierra Madre mountains, in the State of Jalisco. They are hemmed in by rugged and precipitous cliffs, whose walls tower up from 8,000 to 10,000 feet in the air. They lead an isolated and primitive life. Their present belief and customs are those of their ancestors for centuries, long before Cortez came to Mexico. And yet they have a distinctly recognizable Ark and Flood tradition, wherever they got it. They have no Bible, and can neither read nor write. Their legend of the Great Flood and the Ark is substantially as follows:

Long before the Spaniard had come to the adjoining country of the Huichols, an Indian was at work felling trees and clearing his field for planting. He found that the trees that he had cut down would grow up again the next day. This troubled him, and he was determined to find out the cause of it. One day there arose from out of the ground in the middle of the clearing an old woman, with a staff in her hand. She was Grandmother Growth, who is at present the "mother of the gods," and one of the most important deities of the tribe. "All the earth belongs to her," and the growth of all vegetation and food substance is attributed to her power. She made a circle with her staff, when lo! all the trees that had been cut down immediately stood up. Then he understood why his clearing was always covered with trees.

Grandmother Growth told him to work no more, as a great flood was coming, which was not more than five days off, and would be accompanied by a great storm and bitter wind and would cause destruction to all life. She told him to make a box from the fig tree as long as himself, and to fit it with a good cover and to get inside, taking with him "five grains of corn of each of the seven colors," also "the fire and a black dog." He did as he was told. On the fifth day he had the box ready and entered, taking with him the objects as instructed. Then Grandmother Growth put the cover on, sealed the sides, and seated herself on the top of the craft. The box rode on the water for four years. The fifth year the water began to subside, and the box lodged on a mountain, where it still rests.

A Huichol Ranch or Village

The man took off the cover, and, the legend says, he saw that all the country below was still under water. By and by, however, the water began to dry up and trees and grass spring forth, aided by Grandmother Growth. The man went to work at once clearing a field. He lived in a cave, his only companion being the dog which had accompanied him in the ark. When coming home from his work, he would find corn cakes ready for him, and he was curious to know who prepared them. One day he hid himself in the bushes, near the cave, to watch. Suddenly he noticed a woman kneeling down, grinding corn on the metate. She had been transformed by Grandmother Growth from a dog into a human being. He quickly threw her dogskin, which she had hung up to dry, into the fire, and from that time she remained a woman. From their sons and daughters the whole world became peopled.

Mr. Lumholtz has brought home with him an exact miniature of the original Ark of this strange legend, which the Huichols still say is resting on one of their mountain tops. This was made of a log of wood, hollowed out. Two pieces of carved wood, glued on to the tip, are intended to represent deer horns, whose purpose was to entangle the Ark in the bushes when the water subsided, and thus hold it fast. The sides of the Ark are decorated with designs, which are intended to represent water in effect. The wooden images on each side represent a man and dog—the ancestors of the Huichols—who were saved from the Deluge, and the five grains of each of the seven colors of corn which were taken inside.

In the religion of the Huichols the moving principle seems to be a desire to produce rain, whereby they can successfully raise corn, beans and squash, on which they mainly subsist. Water, first and last, is the chief consideration in all their ceremonies. As an extreme means of producing rain this Ark was taken from one of the "god houses" and deposited on the waters of a small lake, by way of a prayer. Their prayers are not oral, but material. They offer to their innumerable heathen gods many remarkable symbolic objects as prayers. These are found and placed in the "god houses" and sacred caves, in deep crevices of rocks, on mountains, and in fact everywhere where some god lives whom the imaginative Huichol may implore for help. Arrows and other carved objects are utilized as messengers to the gods, and are used to convey an expression of prayer for all of their wants, lasting from the cradle to the grave.

The exhibit of this strange race, now displayed at the American Museum of Natural History, New York, shows a wonderful collection of symbols, vividly portraying their general life and culture.

NEW THINGS IN THE KINGDOM

An Unpublished Sermon by DWIGHT L. MOODY, America's Greatest Evangelist*

I WANT to call your attention to some New Things we have when we come into the kingdom of God. If we don't get these, I don't think we are in the kingdom.

Now, I think a great many make a mistake in thinking profession is salvation. They think profession is conversion. They think some act of their own will bring about this wonderful change.

Dwight L. Moody

In the first place, a man must have a new heart before he can serve God. "He that is born of the flesh cannot serve God." The natural man, the carnal mind, cannot be subject to the will of God. The quicker we find that out the better. I think a good many people are in bondage and darkness to-day because, having joined the church and being baptized and confirmed, and partaking of the Lord's Supper and going through the Lord's ordinances, they think it is the new birth. It is nothing of the kind. They are in the right place; but when you put it in the place of salvation—the new birth—you make a fatal mistake. Profession is not conversion. A beggar, putting on a good coat, is a beggar still. A man may have the leprosy and cover it up, and be a leper still. It is "being born from above," "born of God," "born of the Spirit," "born again."

Are We Born of the Spirit?

I beg you not to be deceived. What you want to be sure of is that you started right—that you have been "born of the Spirit." If we have really been born of the Spirit, we are each of us a "new creature." In II. Cor. 5:17 we read: "Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature; old things are passed away; behold, all things have become new." Now, it may be that some will say: "I don't know when and where old things have passed away; and, because I can't set the day and hour that I was converted, I don't know that I have been converted." I don't think I would cross the street to find out when I was converted; but I would go around the world to find out if I was converted. Bishop Simpson says that he was brought to Christ by a godly mother before he was four years old. He could not remember when he was brought into the kingdom. It is not necessary to tell when and where, but it is important to know that "old things have passed away." Like the Scotch lassie, she said she had either changed or Scotland had, because all things "looked different." The sun shone brighter, the horror was through, and the air was a good deal purer. "Old things had passed away."

I remember a man who got up in one of our meetings in New York, after he was converted, his face shining, and he said: "I am a new man in my old clothes." Well, he was a "new man," converted over. People are sometimes anxious to get the "new clothes" and keep the "old man"; but I want to say to you who are trying to help people, don't be so anxious to dress them up as to dress the inside. Get the heart right and everything else will come right. You can't make them right. You may paint a pump; but you can't get pure water out of a bad pump. It is not whitewashing people that will make them better.

Patching Up the "Old Adam"

A friend of mine in Philadelphia built a house on a corner—one of those brownstone houses—and the builder put in stone in front on one side and on the side street put in brick. He went to Europe and then returned. Everything seemed right, but the rain came and soaked the bad places, and great pieces came off. He patched it up, but he had to take out the whole side of the house and put in stone. A lot of men are trying to patch up the old Adam. But you should cut his acquaintance and put in the new. A man that is "born from above" is a new creature. Col. 3:9: "Lie not one to another, seeing that ye have put off the old man with his deeds." Mark you; you are not to stop there, at "putting off the old man," but you are to "put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge, after the image of Him that created him."

* This sermon, never before published, was preached by Mr. Moody in Tremont Temple, Boston, February 19, 1897.

This is the second of twenty remarkable sermons by Moody, never before published, and the existence of which was disclosed only a few weeks ago. The absolute authenticity of the sermons is vouched for by the evangelist's son, Wm. R. Moody, who cordially approves their publication in this paper. The sermons are now the exclusive property of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. One will appear each month.

You don't simply put off all these old things and put on the new at once. That's a mistake people make. They expect a young Christian to come into a full-grown character at once. I have been a Christian forty years, and I find myself still putting off things. I will probably find, ten years from now, that I won't do some things I am doing now. We will grow in all the graces—grow more patient, more like the Son of God, conforming more and more to his image.

The New Nature

The next point is the new nature. If a man is born of God, he has become a new creature and he must have a new nature. Here is a vital point. I was a riddle to myself the first few years after I was converted. I thought God had made my old nature all new. He took away the old nature. I thought so; but when God converts a man he doesn't take away the old nature, but he gives him a new nature. Every man has two natures—a higher and a lower, a carnal and a spiritual, a fleshly and earthly, and a glorified nature. That's the teaching of Scripture. That's a vital point, and you will find sometimes the best Christians do some strange things. Why? They have given way to the old nature—to the old man. A man says, "Well, why don't you have nothing to do with him?" But he has a good deal to do with me. Now, own up to this! Keep it in mind. A horse has only one nature. He is true to his nature. A sheep and an ox are true to their natures. They have one nature; but a child of God has two natures. That's all there is about it—one is a deceitful nature, a corrupt nature, a carnal nature. And, if we have been born of God, we have also a heavenly nature; we are "partakers of the divine nature."

I never had any conflict with my old nature until I got the "new nature." Then the warfare began. I thought I was a pretty good man. And you will find a lot of people who think they are first-rate men. They don't have any conflict, not at all. Why? They are "all right." They don't know anything about the two natures. Read the sixth, seventh and eighth chapters of Romans, with this thought in mind, that every child of God has two natures, and you will understand them. I will read only a few verses of the seventh chapter of Romans: "I know that in me (that is, in my flesh) dwelleth no good thing; for to will is present with me; but how to perform that which is good I find not. For the good that I would, I do not; but the evil which I would not, that I do. Now if I do that I would not, it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. . . . For I delight in the law of God after the inward man; but I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members."

The War of the Flesh and the Spirit

Bring an unrenewed man to these meetings, and he says, "What in the world are these people there for?" But a man with a heavenly nature says, "This is food to my soul. I understand it." If you had brought me in before I was a man of God I should have got up and should have said, "What are these people here for?" "There's another law warring against the law of my mind." "Oh, wretched man that I am! Who shall deliver me from the body of this death? I thank God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. So that with my mind I serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin." These are the two natures. It says in Galatians, the seventeenth verse of the fifth chapter, "The flesh lusteth against the Spirit and the Spirit against the flesh: and these are contrary the one to the other, so that ye cannot do the things that ye would."

A man said he found one foot wanted to go one way and the other foot the other way, and he could not get on. You've got to crucify one nature. Men are either giving way to their corrupt and deceitful nature, or else they are "putting off the old man and putting on the new."

I have had people say to me, "You talk about a 'conflict.' I don't know anything about it." Of course they don't. No man will have a conflict with himself—a fight with himself—about these high things, until he is born from above. You have heard the story of the old judge and the old slave whom he used to take with him around from court to court another over the circuit. The judge said: "Sambo, how is it you are always talking about your fight with the devil—about the conflicts you have with the powers of darkness? I don't have any conflict with the devil. I don't have any of these troubles—any of these fightings you have. How do you account for it?" And he flustered the poor negro. Of course he could not read. But the judge was a sportsman, and he got out his gun one day and killed a duck and wounded another. And he said, "Rush and get that wounded duck. Get that live duck." Sambo got the wounded duck. Sambo had got his illustration. He got back to the wagon. He said, "Jedge, I understan' dat question we were discussin' befo'. De devil's after you. I'm wounded; but he's got you." When a man is dead in trespasses and sins, Satan lets him alone. But you let a man make up his mind he is going to quit the world, and going to give up his old associates and every bad thing, and hell will be let loose upon him. Let a man say, "I've drunk my last drop of liquor," and what a jeer will be made at him! He will have conflicts and fights within and without; there'll be a battle. So there's a higher and a lower nature in every one born of the Spirit. If you haven't any conflict, you haven't been born of the Spirit.

A Christian Is Christ's Man

When a child is born, the next thing is a name. If we are true children of God, we are sons of the Most High God. We are children of God; we can say "Abba." Christ says, "Ye are the children of God." Isn't a man a child of the devil if he is a sinner? And if you turn from your sins, you will be called the "children of the Most High God."

It says in Isa. 62:2: "And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory: and thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the Lord shall name." If I am a Christian, I am Christ's man. Some say, "I feel Christ in Cicero; I feel Christ in Demosthenes." Some men are preaching about the old man back there, as though they were disciples of him. If you are disciples of Christ, follow him. The "family name" is a precious good name after all. Don't bring disgrace upon the name. Don't bring a tarnish upon it.

It is said of Alexander that they wanted him to run a foot-race, and he said he would if he were not the son of a king. Let us remember that we are the sons and daughters of the heavenly King; that our Father is the God of heaven and earth. A woman said, "I wouldn't go to hear Moody again, because he was a millionaire. He said his father was very rich." You can't sum it up. Tell about millions! I'm away up beyond that. Stop at billions! My Father is very rich, and he owns all the banks in the world, the silver and the cattle on a thousand hills. I can't tell you how rich I am. You can become millionaires yourselves, this hour, if you can. Come, get a new name. If you are not a child of God, make up your mind to become one to-day.

Now, I want to get into the new way. I have no sympathy with the man who stays in the old way. It says in Heb. 10:20: "A new and living way, which He hath consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say, His flesh." This old Book and the Holy Ghost declare that what the Lord wants to do is to open up a way of peace, a way of joy, a joyful, light, cheerful path. People say they don't know the way. Just take Christ and follow him, and you will be in the right way. Christ says, "I am right. Follow me, and you get into the new way"; and the only one safe to follow is Jesus. Follow him. Keep your eye on him. All the children of Israel had to do was to follow the cloud—the Captain. Christ Captain has gone on before us and opened up a "new and living way."

Jesus Has Shown the Way

How do I know I am in the way? You will find a lot of landmarks that tell. I am not left in darkness. It is not conceit, either. "His Spirit beareth witness with our spirit." To open up the front trails where men would go, they would strip bark pieces off the bark of a tree. They called it "blazing the way." Christ has "blazed the way" and gone up on high. Follow him. Don't be troubled about creeds and doctrines, and all the popes and ministers and bishops. All you have to do is follow him.

ALL FOOL'S DAY

By Rev. J. M. FARRAR, D.D.*

FOOLISHNESS is bound up in the heart of a child. Bound up in every heart, but tied in a bow-knot. It is sure to get loose for a fun-burst on April 1. All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy. Three cheers for the one day when juniors can get fun on the run. When you boys are old enough to vote, I hope you will make April 1 a national holiday. A day off for sport is the best medicine in the world for that tired feeling. I wish we could make April jokes like skyrockets. Jokes that would burst like a rocket and send out stars and bouquets of laughter. Jokes that girls, as well as boys, can enjoy. A holiday for all, like Labor Day in the fall.

OUR text says fools should not deal foolishly. How can you be fools without dealing foolishly? What do you think of this? In 1719 Peter the Great of Russia introduced the April Fool custom. On the open square in front of his palace, at St. Petersburg, he piled a great quantity of wood, and covered it with oil and tar. Early in the morning of April 1 he set it on fire. The flames shot up high in the air, and it looked from a distance as if the palace and the entire city were aflame. People came from all sides, some of the peasantry traveling miles in their sleighs to put out the fire. When finally they reached the palace, they were met by troops formed up round the square. "Mutton-heads! Swine! Donkeys!" the soldiers shouted. "Fall back, by order of the Czar! Fall back! Can't you understand that the Little Father has fooled you? It is the 1st of April to-day." You think the Czar and the soldiers were dealing foolishly? You are certainly right in your "think." The poor people would be unhappy all day. Then sometimes, when there was a fire, and they were needed, no one would go. They would think some one was fooling them again.

I HAVE a better plan for April Fool's Day fun. A plan that will give you great sport and will not make any one unhappy. If I tell you my plan you may forget it, but if you must hunt until you find it then you will remember. In a story I once read I will hide my plan. You must think, think, think, hunt, hunt, hunt, until you find what I have hid under its lid. The story is about a little girl and her Aunt Helen. "This is your third guess, Aunt Helen; you can't guess why I'm so happy," and Ruth nestled farther down into her little white bed. No one needed to guess that she was happy—her dancing eyes told that; but why, that was what Aunt Helen had made two wrong guesses on already. She had guessed that it was because she was staying a week with her grandmother and aunt, but Ruth had shaken her curly head vigorously. "Partly that, of course," she said, "but that's not it."

THE next thing Aunt Helen guessed was the new ring, with three tiny pearls in it, which Uncle Jack had given her. Ruth told her she was wrong. There was one more chance, but Aunt Helen knew so many things which might make such a merry little girl as Ruth happy that she gave up trying to guess any particular one. "I give it up," she said. "Well," Ruth began, "you never could have guessed if you tried all night, so I'll tell you. It is because I played an April Fool on somebody to-day." "April Fool!" Aunt Helen certainly was surprised. "You know Mr. Dobbs?" Yes, Aunt Helen knew, and she looked very grave. She had known Mr. Dobbs when he was a tall, strong man, before the accident which had crippled him for life. She did not think that Ruth could have been doing anything that might bother him. "You know he passes here every day, making his wheel-chair go with that handle he works back and forth?" Yes, Aunt Helen knew. "Well, when I see him coming I hide behind the little tree in the corner of the yard. Just as soon as he is past, I slip out behind him and begin to push, and I push till he's clear up that little hill."

AUNT HELEN put her arms around Ruth. "I think that is a splendid April Fool joke," she said. "But wait, let me tell you the rest," Ruth went on, squirming from her aunt's embrace. "The funniest part is to hear him wonder why his chair goes so easy. He talks to himself, and I almost laugh out loud to hear him. 'What ails my chair?' he'll say; 'It acts as if it had feet instead of wheels.' And pretty soon he'll say, 'Dear me! am I going crazy? It looks to me as if it was up-hill, but from the way I'm going it must be down-hill.' Oh, it's more fun than anything I ever did; and when I go home Harold Tompkins is going to keep on fooling him. Wouldn't he be the most s'prised man in the world if he ever did find it out?" Aunt Helen tucked the covers around the happy little girl. "I wish all April Fools could be as splendid as that, dear," she said softly. That night Ruth laughed in her sleep.

I HAVE seen our dear friend, Dr. Louis Klopsch, make hundreds of children happy, oh, so happy; but I never saw him deal foolishly with them. His happiness lifted them almost to heaven. He knew how to make April Fool's Day a wise day of real happiness. Next week I shall tell you about his love for children.

Lion Hunting with Roosevelt

THE London Graphic publishes an interesting letter from a lady in Africa, in which she describes a hunting incident during Ex-President Roosevelt's African tour. She writes:

"The Ex-President arrived at the Sirjoit camping ground, Nasin Guishu, on November 18, and it was arranged the lion hunt should take place from there. Fifty picked Nandi natives marched in, in all their war-paint—queer arrangements of feathers on their heads, and cowbells, to make music, fastened to their knees, decorated waist-belts, to which most of them had a small club or knife hanging, the rest of their arms—or, I might say, dress—consisting of a shield and spear. For hunting they dispensed with the cowbells and the feathered head-dresses. They are very fine men, tall and well built, as active as monkeys, and as p' cky as they make 'em."

The party reached a dry river bed, which was covered by long grass and reeds. The writer continues:

"We had not gone far along it when up jumped a splendid lion, dark in color, with a fine mane, and made off toward some fairly open country. Away we galloped in hot pursuit—a most thrilling chase. For a few minutes we lost sight of him in the long grass before he left the river bed, but he was soon viewed as he mounted some rising ground toward some thorn-trees. There seemed to be something incongruous in giving the view halloo! to a lion, and I felt almost ashamed of shouting, "There he goes; forrard away!" after his retreating majesty, king of beasts. We soon gained on him, and he took cover under a low-spreading thorn-tree, growling savagely, lashing his tail and turning from side to side, looking for the weakest spot in the circle of his enemies, who were gradually forming round him.

"We had a perfect view of him within about thirty yards. . . . I expected he would charge. Very soon he did, but not at us. He came out at a trot for a few yards, still growling, then reared up and threw himself at the line of natives. He looked magnificent, and they faced him without flinching. In a flash he had a man down who got his spear home, but was mauled himself in the shoulder and arm. Then, feeling another spear on the other side, the lion turned and seized another man, and clawed him, at the same time biting furiously at yet another spear, which he doubled up in his mouth, knocking out two of his own teeth and chipping a bit out of his tongue as he fell, still fighting, pierced through and through with about twenty spears.

"The excitement was now great and general, and kodaks flashed to the fore as the victorious Nandis, holding their shields over their heads, marched round singing a deep-throated and rather melodious dirge over their fallen foe. He was a game and gallant foe, well worthy of their own courage."

On Donkey-Back Through Phœnicia

By O. E. MOFFET, Occasional Correspondent

Court of a Christian Merchant's Garden

The Harbor of Ancient Tyre

Fishing in the River Kishon—Mt. Carmel in Distance

WE were to ride from Beirut to Zidon. We must be out at sunrise to take the stage. At that early hour many countrymen and women were in the streets. They led little donkeys, laden with green hay, wood and garden produce.

Our stage was an ordinary three-seated spring-wagon; but the rear seat had a curtain hung in front of it, and was occupied by three closely-veiled Mohammedan women.

The lofty Lebanon still cast its shadow on the narrow strip of low land, near the Mediterranean, as we started southward. On the outskirts of Beirut are lovely little gardens, well watered and enclosed by stone walls or cactus hedges; also orchards of oranges, figs and pomegranates.

Phœnicia's Ancient Glories

On the left there is a fine view of the glens and villages of Lebanon, and the great mountains above and beyond. We could see the smoke of the Damascus train, miles away and nearly five thousand feet above us. Two charcoal kilns cast their blue columns of smoke above the green of the mountains. The road, a good gravel turnpike, then led us into an olive grove, said to be the largest in all Syria. We traveled under or by its trees four or five miles.

We were approaching the strip of coast which was once Phœnicia. It is hard to realize that Phœnicia proper, so great in its influence on civilization, was only twenty-eight miles long and one mile wide. It planted colonies on every known coast. Its sailors were the first to round the Cape of Good Hope and to visit the British Islands; yet its northern boundary was a little above Zidon, its southern just below Tyre. One can walk its entire coast, and view nearly every foot of its land, in less than a day. And this was Phœnicia proper, greatest of the ancient nations in wealth, manufacture and commerce. In a broader sense, Phœnicia included its colonies on a strip of coast rarely exceeding twenty miles in width, beginning with the island of Ardus on the north and extending one hundred and twenty miles to Dora, just below Mt. Carmel. Some historians say it extended farther south than Dora, and had a coast of two hundred miles.

The Country Taking on New Life

Phœnicia's origin was in prehistoric times. That her people were Semites, like the Jews, there can be no doubt. Besides their great cities of Zidon and Tyre, their whole coast was studded with towns, forming almost an unbroken line. The ruins can still be traced by the antiquarians. The settlement of Israel in Canaan produced no great change in Phœnicia. The tribes of Naphtali, Asher and Dan, to whom it was assigned, never conquered it; and the subsequent relations of Israel and Phœnicia were those of intercourse and reciprocal advantage. David and Hiram were friends and co-workers.

The Phœnicians furnished the skilled artisans in wood and metal for Solomon's temple and built the best ships in Xerxes' fleet. They are said to have given us our alphabet. The Phœnician country was small; but her real dominion was the sea. H wealth and power arose from her command of As we passed Khan Khulda we saw many s cophagi on the hillside, and other indicatic that here was once a populous city. We were n so much impressed with signs of the ancient civ zation as those that showed that the country taking on new life. Along the way were thousar of acres of young mulberry trees. Sometimes aqueduct ran by the roadside, and the crystal flo of Lebanon sang and sparkled as it raced on life-giving mission to the groves. Nearly all t water of Nahr-ed-Damur (the ancient Tamyras) now used for irrigation. From the groves came songs of birds, and voices and laughter. Sometin we caught glimpses of women and girls, in brig colored costumes, among the trees gathering lea to feed silkworms. The silk industry is grow very rapidly in this district. A little way from road there is a stone building, resembling a gr factory. Here the cocoons are unwound, and raw silk prepared for market; some of the Syr silk is also woven here. A little of the raw silk woven in neighboring towns. Most of it is ship to Lyons, France, and other parts of the world.

There were fields where gangs of men with m tocks and spades were "making groves." To p pare the land the stones are dug out, leaving rich, red soil two feet deep above its rock foun tion. The stones are then built into walls about plot, a square basin for storing water, and aq ducts to convey it to the trees. These are plaste and made water-tight. Then the grove is plant and each one represents an immense amount labor. The soil that still remains on the rocks the richest in the world.

An Industrial Awakening

Signs of industrial awakening are seen on ev side. One of my fellow-passengers, a nat told me he had spent fifteen years in A tralia. With his kinsman, he established a flo ishing business there. He had returned, and b a stone residence on Mount Lebanon, and est lished a branch business house and was send out the manufactured articles of his country to own and other retail stores in Australia. He sa "Many of the new residences you see in this dist were built by such business men as I. Some h interests in the United States, but most in So America. We are no longer numbered by hundr but by thousands. These mulberry groves, school and college work you have been speaking and the many new houses you saw on Lebanon signs that Phœnicia is being resurrected. My m chant friends and I hope to keep alive her anci reputation for trade."

The natives take a peculiar pride in the past tory of their country. There is a disposition keep alive their ancient reputation, not merely trade, but for other things, and these efforts sometimes quite laughable. As we crossed a bri near Zidon, there were two native girls walking ahead of us, each carrying a bundle of green hay

h head the size of a haycock. This bridge had a sd stone railing little more than a foot high. A m was down by the bridge, mending it, so that the tc of his red fez cap appeared just above this rail. A the girls passed one of them kicked off his fez, sing as she did so, "Sister, it is not wise to have th ugly thing protruding, like a great rooster's c b." The lady passengers were shocked. Such a act is far more indecorous according to their stdards than according to ours. Our ladies de- cred they had not seen so rude an act, no, not in a Syria; nor would one see such save in "wicked Z n." Afterward, an observer was careful to ex- p n to me that the man by the bridge was the g 's father. "She did it," he said, "just to shock o ladies and keep up the evil reputation of Zidon."

We ran over a headland where the road was worn d into the solid rock. This part of it has been u l more than three thousand years. Here once st d the fortress of Platana, where Antiochus the G at and Ptolemy fought in 218 B.C.

Zidon's Departed Greatness

idon was one of the most ancient cities of the w ld, named after the firstborn of Canaan, the g ndson of Noah (Gen. 10:15-19). It is called "t eat Zidon" in Josh. 11:8, Josh. 19:28. Homer sp aks of the skill of its workers. The embroidered r e of Andromache, the silver bowls given at the g nes in honor of Patrocles and Telemachus, the p ple of fierce Achilles, were of Zidonian handi- cft. Zidonian ships were with the fleet that be- sged Troy. It is mentioned in cuneiform tablets o 500 B.C., and by the Egyptians, 1300 B.C. Our S iour appears to have visited the coasts of Tyre a Zidon (then called "Sidon") (Mark 7:24). The p sent town is on a promontory, and slopes down t he sea. It is called Saida, and is irregular in sl pe, with narrow, dark and dirty streets, like a ys. Its population is about ten thousand, mostly Mslems. The natives of Saida have a sarcastic m ner of address and a tendency to ridicule, which I ever noticed in the inhabitants of any other town in this country. This tendency was possessed by th ancient Zidonians, if we can form an opinion fm the little that remains of their literature, w ch is only a few fragments in Greek translations. Ts tendency to ridicule may have helped to give t m their evil reputation.

Two Peculiar Streets

There is a street in the modern town named "r oad Street." A native said to me, "That street is wide; it is so very wide that, if you spread your a ms as you walk through, you will touch both of its sides." It was five feet wide. There is another s eet where balconies meet, and arches are thrown a oss, so low that you have to crawl on hands and knees in places. They named it High Street. The harbor is filled with silt and is too shallow for large boats. There is an extensive burying ground where, it is said, many curious sarcophagi have been found. I remember seeing one of them in the Louvre in Paris, with an inscription begging the reader not to touch it, and, like Shakespeare, calling down a curse on whoever moved his bones. It was of the third century B.C. Back of the city there is a great pile of sea shells, sixty feet high, and covering several acres; the refuse from the ancient dyeworks. These probably furnished the purple for the world in Homer's time. Zidon will rise again, not to be a great world power any more, but the centre of an influence which will cover the mountains and plains with gardens and groves, and plant homes where there shall be happiness and contentment.

What Our Missionaries Are Doing

The American Presbyterian Board has a flourishing mission in Saida. There are schools for boys and girls, presided over by Dr. Jessop. This school and its venerable head have gained a deep influence over the people here and in the surrounding country. At Nazareth, fifty miles away, I was told by natives that Dr. Jessop's was one of the best schools in the country and several young men of that place attended it. In some of the religious services where I worshiped before reaching Saida, our American Gospel hymn tunes were sung, fitted to native words. The combination was not pleasant. Their words seemed to jerk the harmony out of shape. I am quite sure I could not express my religious emotions in a Syrian tune. The songs sung in Dr. Jessop's schools, however, had tunes to fit the words, and the lives and emotions of these people and the boys were lifted up in spirit, and they sang them with a will.

A Spiritual and Material Uplift

The schools, both for boys and girls, were crowded, and a hospital was much needed. Indeed, Dr. Jessop's schools, as well as his songs and worship, lift the natives up. The words of my fellow-passenger came back to me, "These are signs that ancient Phœnicia is being resurrected." The greatest power to lift her from her ancient grave is the work of the missionaries. Dr. Jessop's school at Saida is only one of many. One finds them in nearly every large town. The merchants who have carried their trade into other lands, almost without an exception, have been educated in these missionary schools. Most of them started without capital; but in these schools they learned not only the religion, but the language and the customs of the people with whom they afterward traded. The leaders in the great movement to revive home industries, and plant the land to orchards and groves, received their impulse from the missionaries. It was through the influence of the missionaries that the Christian powers, after the massacre of Christians in 1860, took steps to establish a just and stable government for the people of the Mount Lebanon district. The beginning of its prosperity dates from this event.

Phœnicia is being resurrected through the labor of the missionaries, the servants of Him who is the "resurrection and the life."

Our Peaceful Relations

FORMER Vice-President Fairbanks is home again from his globe-circling tour, and he brings with him, as the result of extended observations, a message of peace. "There is not the slightest ground," he says, "for the suggestion of any danger of war between the United States and Japan, or with any other power." He met and talked with the foremost men in Japan—the Emperor, Cabinet members, statesmen, editors, business men—and he found them all possessed of a "genuine and undisguised admiration and respect" for this country. Conflict of view as to American rights in Manchuria, or elsewhere, he points out, does not necessarily imply serious difficulty. Each country is acting in absolute good faith toward the other, and the usual processes of diplomacy are equal to the adjustment of any question that can now be foreseen. This applies also to Great Britain, and to all other foreign countries. Mr. Fairbanks is a shrewd and experienced observer, and such words from him should weigh more than all the sensational talk of the alarmist journals of London, Paris, Berlin and Vienna, whose chief source of information is the vivid imagination of their correspondents.

Still Lying About Lincoln

IN their "campaign of education" the liquor interests have not hesitated to falsify history. By some means, a copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD found its way into the hands of a brewing company at New Ulm, Minn. Now, we have no brewing companies on our subscription list, and this particular concern, having no doubt looked carefully through the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, returned it to us with this endorsement on the cover page: "Cannot use this in our business." We quite understand how any brewing company would come to such a conclusion. There is nothing in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that would warrant them in concluding that the paper contained anything that could be construed as helpful to the brewing interests. At no time has this journal hesitated to tell the truth about that business, and it will continue to do so. Truth, of course, is the very last thing in the world that the brewers desire to have printed, or which they can "use in their business."

Enclosed within the pages of the paper which was returned to us by this Minnesota brewing company was a printed leaflet, headed "What Did Lincoln Say? Here Is What He Did Say," and which then proceeds to quote from the well-known address by Lincoln before the Washington Temperance Society, February 22, 1842. We have before us the full text of that address, and the brewers' extract is part of a paragraph in which Mr. Lincoln was reviewing the drinking customs of the past, and had no relation to existing conditions in 1842. Its use in the brewers' circular was a clear case of deliberate perversion. One need only glance at the address to understand how contemptible is the trick employed by the Brewers' Literary Syndicate to make Lincoln appear as an advocate and apologist of drinking, when all his life he was an enemy of the traffic in every form. He preached temperance and practised it; he never used liquor and would not have it in his home. When he was visited by the committee appointed to notify him of his nomination he surprised them by saying: "Gentlemen, we must pledge our mutual healths in the most healthy beverage God has given to man. It is the only beverage I have ever used or allowed in my family, and I cannot conscientiously depart from it on the present occasion. It is pure Adam's ale from the spring." And he pledged them in a cup of cold water, his guests following his example.

There is not in all of his writings and speeches a single syllable that can be construed into even a modified approval of the liquor traffic, although the brewers have tried to put lying words into his dead lips to help their cause. John G. Nicolay, his secretary and biographer, who was closer to Lincoln than any other man and who could speak with authority, nailed some of those lies which were set afloat about Lincoln's views on temperance. There is a clear chain of indisputable evidence, accessible to all who want the truth, to prove that Lincoln was a total abstainer all his life.

A Relic of Barbarism

WHENEVER an important criminal investigation is under way we read frequently of "the third degree" being applied to the prisoner who is under suspicion, and the phrase slips glibly from the tongue of the general public as something which is an accepted fact in our legal procedure. The more calmly we accept the fact that the so-called third degree is permitted to be used by police and prosecuting attorneys the more we should be ashamed that this relic, or revival, of barbarism is permitted.

Without giving names or place, a recent case will illustrate the third degree as it is used in our enlightened year of 1910. A young man is accused of murder, and the police attempt to extort a confession. They show the frightened man clothes taken from the body of the slain woman "to shake his nerve." Then they question him, one inquisitor taking the place of another as they get tired out. The harassed prisoner is kept hour after hour on the rack until his head is confused and he may make statements detrimental to his case through sheer exhaustion. He is kept from having food, or perhaps even water. Then they keep him awake twenty-four or forty-eight hours, until the man is a mental and physical wreck.

We say torture has been eliminated from our criminal investigations. Has it? So long as we permit the use in any form of the "third degree" methods we have nothing to boast over the Middle Ages, when men were put on the rack to extort confessions. These confessions were valueless, for men in agony would admit crimes they had not committed in order to escape the ordeal.

Every prisoner should be protected and fairly tried. If a voluntary confession is not forthcoming, the officers of the law should wait for the regular trial. Many a man, innocent of wrongdoing, has doubtless been badgered into statements seriously affecting his case, if not condemning him altogether. Psychologists have records of cases where men have confessed crimes under auto-suggestion, and suffered the extreme penalty of the law in consequence. Our legislators and our judges should do all in their power to cut out this blot on our twentieth century civilization.

It was the old principle that a man was innocent until proved guilty by trial. Then no man should be tried in secret by any prosecuting attorney, or by police officials, to the prejudice of his case. In some ways we are not as humane and enlightened a country as we like to think we are. The public can demand a reform in such methods, for they have no legal backing. When they are used the public should see that such officials are put where they cannot repeat them.

The People Want to Know

NOW that the controversy over second-class postal rates has been pretty thoroughly ventilated, the public is beginning to inquire how it happened that it costs the government nine cents per pound to transport and deliver second-class matter, consisting of magazines and other periodical publications, when the express companies are practically able to compete with the government at the present one-cent rate and to do this not only without loss, but presumably at a fair profit.

Again, people are naturally asking how it happens that Canada, with a territory quite as large as ours and less thickly settled, is able to carry through its postoffice magazines and newspapers at one-quarter of one cent per pound, and still make a profit, the Canadian postoffice showing a surplus of $809,000.

We believe the President is thoroughly sincere in his desire to get at the facts concerning postoffice methods, but there is evidently something yet to be disclosed. It is not always a simple thing to get at the facts of the inner workings of great departments—witness the mass of misinformation which seems to have been supplied in connection with e Conservation inquiry. We believe, also, that e Congressional Committee on Postoffices and P- roads is genuinely desirous of reaching a just d equitable conclusion in the second-class rate pr- lem. The country will not be satisfied with a- thing short of intelligent, equitable decision, ba d upon a clear understanding of the situation.

Economy in the Kitchen

ONE of the unexpected, but not unwelcome, res s of the meat boycott and the general agita n over the high cost of living is the announcem t from Washington of the preparation of a cook bk by our Department of Agriculture. It bears e title "Economic Use of Meats in the Home," and - forms housewives how the cheaper cuts of meats n be prepared and served so that they may be as - atable and nourishing as the more expensive c s. It gives a large amount of useful information t generally known, and is intended by Secretary W- son, head of the department, to be of real servic n American homes. Dalai Lama's Flight

THERE has been a good deal of mystery over the recent flight of the Dalai Lama from his Tibetan capital. It was stated several weeks so that he had fled through the fear of punishment at the hands of China for various offenses against the suzerian power. Tibet has been a tributary to China for many centuries, and it is believed that the Dalai's attitude toward certain foreign governments was practically construed as a menace to China's authority in Tibet; consequently, China's military column was sent across the border to Lhassa, but previous to its arrival the conscience-stricken Dalai had fled. There are two rulers in Tibet: the first, who enjoys the higher reputation, being the Tashi Lama, who is the spiritual head of the nation and who has his seat of power at Gyantse. He is the spiritual leader of the people, and is called Panchen Rinpoche, "Great Precious Teacher." The Dalai Lama, on the other hand, is the political or secular ruler, and is called Gyalpo Rinpoche, "Precious King." The travelers write approvingly of the Tashi Lama, crediting him with many graces of character. He visited India some time ago. The Dalai Lama has also traveled beyond the boundaries of his realm. After the Younghusband expedition to Tibet, in 1904, the Dalai fled, and only returned lately, with authority from Peking to resume his control of affairs in Lhassa. He is represented as quarrelsome, petulant, fickle, overbearing and cowardly. A Japanese author, Kawaguchi, who visited him, evidently did not receive a favorable impression, for he says only, "I heard and saw much of him, and had frequent interviews with him," but he is significantly silent on the subject of these interviews. Sven Hedin, the famous Swedish explorer, met the Tashi Lama, and has recorded his impressions of the spiritual ruler in favorable terms. Tibet is a Buddhist nation, that religion having been introduced into the nation nearly fourteen hundred years ago from Western India. It is a religion which is intermingled with the Bompa faith, which is a religion of demons, mysteries and the grossest idolatry, and the two Popes, as the Lamas may be called, employ all the power at their command to preserve it unchanged. The country is oppressed to the verge of ruin by its ecclesiastical system. There are thousands of monasteries and thousands of monks. Eighteen thousand monks live in and around Lassa, and in some parts of the country every seventh man is a monk, and must be provided for by others. Consequently the poverty of the common people is very great and the state of morals is deplorable. Tibet has been known as the "sealed nation." On account of the obstacles to be surmounted and the determined resistance of the Lamaist monks to the introduction of any new religions, it has been thus far impossible to secure a foothold for the Gospel. There are several Protestant missions on the Tibetan frontier, and it is hoped that ere long the Light will penetrate the spiritual darkness of that unhappy and neglected country and that the Gospel may be permitted to have free course within its borders. The prophet, in his description of the distress of the children of Israel for their sins and idolatry, uses an expression which can be applied to the unwisdom and immorality of the spiritual leaders of Tibet:

The prophet is a fool, the spiritual man is mad. (Hos. 9:7.)

Back to the Soil

Mr. James J. Hill, the master railroad builder, in an interview has made mention of some of the causes of the cost of high living and some of the dangers that confront the nation. He lays most of the blame on the neglect of the farming industry. He holds the great drift of the people from the farm to the cities largely responsible for present and prospective difficulties. He insists that the commercial, manufacturing and mining industries have been brought pretty nearly to perfection in this country, but that the farm productions are not keeping pace with the increase of population and that there must be a turning of the people from the city to the agricultural districts before we can have our ideal prosperity. He thinks that the high cost of living is produced very much by the cost of high living. He charges a shameless extravagance upon the part of the people. The loneliness and the monotony of American farm life have driven the boys and girls from the country to the city. Now the trolleys, the telephones, the electric lights, and many inventions have made the farm more attractive, and the millionaires even are leaving the crowded city for their country-seats, which they make their home most of the months of the year, so that the danger which Mr. Hill describes is likely to be removed and the science which has increased the product of the farm will also aid greatly in the solution of the perplexing problem. The agriculture is the primitive and basal industry of the race. Its success is largely the measure of national thrift and happiness. This was the employment to which our first parent was set.

And the Lord God took the man and put him into the garden of Eden to dress it and to keep it. (Gen. 2:15.)

Fox and Diamond

Edward McGowan, a poultry breeder near Montville, N. J., recently captured a fox, in whose stomach he found a diamond valued at $500. His daughter two weeks before had lost the jewel, and a hen, needing the stone to help grind her food, swallowed it. The fox, in robbing the farmer's coop, had captured and eaten this hen, and hence the discovery of the diamond. The precious stone satisfied the demands of the hen as well as an ordinary piece of gravel would have done. The animal with sharper teeth and stronger claw fed on the weaker one, according to the law of the lower tribes. The world is full of big fish and animals eating the smaller ones, of foxes stealing hens, even the high-priced poultry which the breeder happened to have. The tricky, lying, thieving characters of human society are referred to as foxes in the Scripture. Christ himself in mentioning Herod says:

Go ye, and tell that fox. (Luke 13:32.)

Memorable Senatorial Farewell

On the death of Senator McLaurin of Mississippi the Governor appointed Colonel James Gordon to be his successor, which place he occupied for two months, at which time the Mississippi Legislature chose Leroy Percy to succeed Senator McLaurin. Senator Gordon made a farewell address to the United States Senators, which was one of the most unique and delightful ever given in that body. He spoke of the dreams he had had of a place in the United States Senate and how his dear mother encouraged them. He ridiculed and condemned the agitators who were trying to stir up strife among the people of our land. He made mention of incidents in his Confederate Army life, including the capture of General Shafter. He said: "General Shafter was a very poor shot, for I advanced on him with my sabre, and he shot at me five times and never touched me. I chanced to render a little personal kindness to General Coburn, of Indianapolis, while he was a prisoner of war under me, in recognition of which the Union Army, when it passed my old home, gave us a guard and protected the family." Toward the close of his remarks he said: "I come to talk of friendship and of love for one another. My religion is the eleventh commandment of Christ, when he said, 'A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another.' That is what I want to bring about here; that is my object in standing here to-day to talk to you as I do. I want to implant in you, just as it is in my heart for the country I live in and the people I live with. I live with you all. You are not divided from me by Mason and Dixon's line. I want to wipe out all lines." As the climax of his speech the Senator gave four stanzas of his own poetry on "The Old Black Mammy," the last of which was:

She was lovely to me in her colored bandanna
With which she turbaned her head.
Her songs were far sweeter than flute or piano,
As she put me to sleep in my bed.
Her soft crooning voice I can never forget;
Like an angel in dreams she comes to me yet.

The Senators went wild over this speech and their congratulations of it. It is said that President Taft threw his arms about him and hugged him as he thanked him for the message; and Colonel Gordon, by his humor, pathos, wholesome truth and divine sentiment, did as much in that one talk as an ordinary Senator could in a hundred years in bringing about peace and good will between North and South. The Senator's speech was in obedience to what he called the eleventh commandment.

This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets. (Matt. 22:38-40.)

A Criminal Judge

A judge in a certain city in New Jersey ran a gambling establishment over his court-room. The police authorities, becoming aware of the criminal institution, raided it and the judge was convicted of running a gambling hell, and was remanded to await his sentence of imprisonment. A judge of Brooklyn has just been convicted of bribery, and is to go to prison. It is a fortunate thing for the country that our judiciary, which is one of the foundation stones of the republic, has from the beginning been so pure. Now and then, however, a corrupt judge, in the lower and sometimes higher courts, has been found who has soiled his ermine and become one of the greatest enemies of the State. It is a healthful condition of public morals when punishment is meted out to these betrayers of trust. The judges of our land to-day may well pay attention to the instruction which the King of Judah gave to the judges at the time he appointed them:

And he said to the judges, Take heed what ye do; for ye judge not for man, but for the Lord, who is with you in the judgment. (II. Chron. 19:6.)

Dead Hero Rewarded

The Carnegie Hero Fund Commission, the other day at Pittsburg, made seventeen awards, including medals and about $20,000 in cash. Cornelius Bertram, to whom a medal was awarded, will never wear it, because he was drowned in Spuyten Duyvil Creek while trying to save his companion. After a game of baseball, Bertram and a friend named Zimmerman decided on a swim in the creek. Zimmerman, when far from shore, threw up his hands and called for help. Bertram swam to his side, and told him to lie on his back, so that he could be towed in. When almost to the bank, Zimmerman became frightened and grabbed Bertram about the neck, and both were drowned. The parents of the young hero were very proud when the boy's medal was sent to them; and what a splendid example of heroism to lift every one out of selfishness and prompt to sacrifice! How like his Master was the spirit of the boy who gave his life for another, and how unlike his Master in his inability to save one for whom he died! The heroism of the boy in offering his life for another is the standard which Christianity requires of its followers, as contained in one of the Epistles:

Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he hath laid down his life for us; and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren. (I. John 3:16.)

PITTSBURG'S HISTORIC FORT

ONE of the most interesting historical spots in America is at the forks of the Ohio River, at Pittsburg, Pa. Here to-day stands the celebrated Redoubt, which witnessed many battles with the Indians, long before the War of the Revolution. The old fort is in a good state of preservation. One can see the apertures in the first and second stories, where the muskets of the brave defenders kept off the foe. The lower part is of stone, the upper part of brick. The walls are about two feet thick, and are built very strongly, with logs for the roof.

It is the greatest historical treasure in Pittsburg, and one of the most famous spots in America. As early as 1728, a brave hunter or trader found the Indians at the headwaters of the Ohio. Among the red men were Mohicans, Shawanese, Iroquois and Delawares. Seventeen miles down the river was their village, called Logstown. The whole country was then covered with magnificent forests, and here the Indians tracked the bear. At that time France and England were in a struggle to see which nation should possess the new continent of America. At the point of land where the famous Block House still stands two rivers meet to form the Ohio River. These are the Monongahela and the Alleghany. As there were no good roads through the wilderness in those early days, the rivers were important arteries of travel, and the Indian canoes could be counted by hundreds. George Washington came to the headwaters of the Ohio in November, 1753, when he was only twenty-one years of age. He came as the agent of Governor Dinwiddie of Virginia, as that colony claimed this section of Pennsylvania as her own territory. Washington came to treat with the Indians. He had with him a famous guide, Christopher Gist. After traversing this wilderness, Major Washington decided that the best site for a fort was at the point where the Block House now stands, so this strategic site was chosen. In 1731 French settlers attempted to build at this point of the three rivers, but the Indians drove them away. In 1747 France sent a French officer, Louis Celeron, into this section and claimed all the territory as French soil. Virginia sent Captain William Trent, with a force of soldiers, workmen, pack-horses, and material to build a fort at the headwaters of the Ohio, February 17, 1754. The news must have been taken to the French by Indian scouts and runners, for before the fort was finished they came in great force to capture the stronghold. Down the Alleghany River came the French Captain Contrecœur, with one thousand French, Canadians and Indians, in a flotilla of sixty bateaux and three hundred canoes, and they had eighteen cannon. No wonder that the subaltern who commanded in Captain Trent's absence—as the fort was unfinished, and as he had but thirty-three men—decided to surrender to the French. He was allowed to march away with his handful of men. The French ran up their flag, and finished the fort and named it Fort Duquesne, in honor of the governor of Canada.

After many vicissitudes, the fort came into possession of the English and was renamed Fort Pitt, after the "great Commoner" of England. This cut off the French transportation to the Mississippi by way of the Ohio, and soon afterward the fall of the French fort Niagara, the fall of Quebec, and the capture of Montreal ended the claims of France to sovereignty in the New World. General Stanwix enlarged Fort Pitt so that it would accommodate a garrison of a thousand men. The Indians were suspicious of the English, with this enlarged new fort. Colonel Henry Bouquet built the Block House in 1764. The protection of the garrison attracted a few traders, merchants and pioneers to the place, and a permanent population began to grow, and this was the beginning of the great city of Pittsburg. This settlement was first called Pittsburg in 1758.

The Indians still resented the extension of white encroachments upon their hunting grounds. They formed a secret confederacy, under the famous Pontiac, the Ottawa chief, who planned a simultaneous attack on all white frontier forts. The Indian tribes held a grand council, and a bundle of stic was given to each tribe, each bundle containing many sticks as there were days intervening befo the attack should commence. One stick was to taken from the bundle every day until but one w left, and this was to be the signal for the assau This was the Indian's calendar. At Pittsburg t attack of the Indians was three days in advance the attack on the other white forts, because an dian squaw, friendly to the whites, had secre taken out three sticks from the fatal bundle.

On June 22, 1763, the Delawares and Shawan began the assault on Fort Pitt. The people Pittsburg took shelter in the fort. Fort Pitt wa strong fortress. It cost the Engli government three hundred thousa dollars, and was built of Flemish bri and was surrounded by a stockade a a moat. Eighteen pieces of artill were mounted on the bastions. T occupants were stirred to an heroic fense. The savages swept the s rounding country, carrying death a destruction among white settlers eve where. Several other forts were c tured, and their garrisons either but ered on the spot or carried away the amusement of their cruel captors be tortured. Hundreds of trad were slaughtered without pity, a their wives and children were eitl murdered or carried off captives. T Indians destroyed or stole, it is e mated, $2,500,000 worth of property this terrible uprising.

The garrison at Fort Pitt only nu bered 350 men. The barracks c tained many women and children. T settlers also crowded the fort, a smallpox broke out. Soon the Indi appeared in vast numbers. They s volleys of bullets and fire-arrows i the fort. The women and child were terror-stricken. For five aw days the savages kept up the assa It looked very dark for the garri and inmates, for their food and amm nition were getting low; but Colo Bouquet was on his way to reinfo the fort, with five hundred troops. Defeating Indians at the battle of Bushy Run, after a conf which raged two days, he reached Fort Pitt, and defenders welcomed their deliverers with abunda of provisions, ammunition and stores. It was this time, in the summer of 1764, that Colonel B quet built the historic Block House, which is all t now remains of Fort Pitt, and the only monumen British occupancy in this great section of Amer This famous building is now owned and preser carefully and patriotically, by the Daughters of American Revolution of Allegheny County, Pe sylvania. It is one of the most celebrated la marks of American liberty.

SUFFRAGE RIOTS IN GERMANY

AT present part of the people of Prussia, especially in Berlin, are much excited over a proposed change in the suffrage, and are holding demonstrations that remind some of the older citizens of the stormy days which preceded the revolution of 1848.

After large mass meetings had been held in Berlin, the crowds marched to the square in front of the Emperor's palace, and cheered the movement for wider suffrage. Few guards were visible, and the palace windows remained blank. As the demonstration continued, and the men in the crowd became more excited, several platoons of police appeared, and the agitators were ordered to leave the square. This they did not seem disposed to do, so the police charged and drove them down some side streets, where they dispersed. No one was badly injured, but some of those who were reluctant to leave the square are now nursing sore heads where they came into violent contact with the flat side of the short swords worn by the police of Berlin.

Where the meetings have been orderly the authorities showed no desire to interfere, but they evidently intend to stop any rioting before it reaches revolutionary proportions. A number of str have been declared by workingmen's organizati with the idea of furthering the cause. Four th sand workmen in the d yards at Kiel struck for day. The company, to re iate, would not start up works again until three d later. This enraged the n as they had nothing to do the suffrage question one or the other. The men bec angry and started numer street parades, and as a re there were several clashes the Kiel police. The Social declared they would tie every national industry if their demands were not gr ed in full.

On Wednesday, March the Prussian suffrage b passed the Diet. The vote 238 to 168. It was expe that the Socialists would m a demonstration outside building, but there was no turbance when the vote declared. The new bill sub tutes direct suffrage for i rect. This bill does not a the other States of the Ger empire.

PROMINENT PEOPLE TALKED ABOUT

HANCELLOR HENRY MITCHELL MacCRACKEN, of New York University, has announced his intention of retiring at the end the present academic year. He has served in his esent capacity for twenty-five years, and has re-odeled completely the university and its system of struction, inaugurating methods which, though nsidered radical at the time, have been adopted colleges and universities from the Atlantic to e Pacific Coast.

ie value of his oup system of urses is now con-lered beyond estion. The uni-rsity at present noted for its hool of commerce, hich is probably equaled by any nilar department any American iversity.

Chancellor Mac-acken was born Oxford, O., in 40. He was edu-ed at Miami iversity and at e theological sem-aries at Xenia, , and Princeton. ter he studied at bingen and Ber-. After several ars in the minis-y and in teaching became chancel-r of Western University, at Pittsburg. In 1881 became professor of philosophy and vice-chan-lor of New York University. In 1891 he became ancellor.

For years the departments of the university were under one roof at the famous old building on the t side of Washington Square, the oasis of grass d trees almost within sound of the turmoil of loadway. A large structure was built where the school of commerce, law and other non-academic departments were housed, while a large tract, now known as University Heights, in upper New York, was purchased and the academic and scientific departments moved there. Several beautiful structures had been built on the Heights, including the Hall of Fame, which makes a half-arch about the university library. The campus is one of great beauty, commanding views of the Hudson Valley.

Lord Rosebery

President Mendoza

Chancellor MacCracken

Dr. Mendoza is the new President of Panama, in succession to President Obaldia, who died recently. The new President delivered the funeral oration, and made a strong appeal for the patriotic support of the people of Panama. Rumors of revolution had died down, and all seems destined to go quietly.

It was hoped by the Liberal party of Great Britain, before the recent election, that it would be restored to Parliament by such a large majority that it would be able to reform the House of Lords as it wished and take away entirely its veto power. The election proved a disappointment to Mr. Asquith. Nevertheless, some change is probable in the House of Lords, by which the Lords will be made more representative, so that they will not be able to kill at will the measures introduced by the party in power in the Commons. There has been one great drawback to the plan. The Lords would have to vote to give up their legislative rights voluntarily. The most feasible plan is that prepared by Lord Rosebery, who, during the recent discussion, occupied a cross-bench and remained neutral. He proposes that part at least of the Lords be elected, and that certain service in the army, navy, or other state employment, may make a man eligible. Of course, only a peer could stand for election or promotion to the Upper House. The younger peers are to be allowed to stand for the House of Commons. The plan has much in its favor.

Lord Rosebery is the fifth earl of the title, and is descended from an old and noble Scotch family. He has eight titles in all. He has been Prime Minister of England, besides having been in public life from early manhood. Whatever plan he proposes will be sure of careful consideration by all classes of people.

THE NEXT INTERNATIONAL WEDDING

HE spring of 1910 will be marked by the weddings of a number of young people whose parents or other relatives, if not the bridegrooms themselves, are conspicuous in public life; t perhaps the most interesting of these events will an international matrimonial alliance. It is the coming marriage of Ferdinand von Stumm, Secl Secretary of the German Embassy at Washi ton, and Miss Constance Hoyt, daughter of Inry M. Hoyt, first occupant of the newly-created sition of Counselor to the United States Departnnt of State.

The handsome young German diplomat is, in his oice of an American bride, conforming to what h come to be regarded as a tradition in his family. Eh his father and his grandfather married Amerin women. Baron Ferdinand von Stumm's mother s the former Miss Pauline von Hoffman, of New York City, and his grandmother was, prior to her marriage, Miss Grimes of Staten Island.

The wedding of Miss Hoyt and Baron von Stumm comes as the culmination of a good old-fashioned love story. The Baron, who is making progress in his profession, as is evidenced by his promotion from Third to Second Secretary recently, is a clean-cut, likable young man, and, in personal appearance and accent, seems more American than German. He also manifests something of the democracy of the Republic, maintains a modest "bachelors' hall" with one of his fellow diplomats of the German Embassy, and finds his chief diversion in driving his own motor car.

Miss Hoyt, the baron's fiancee, is an attractive, unaffected girl who has seen enough of official life during her father's long service as Solicitor General of the United States to qualify her to preside over an official home in any capital of the world.

That the opposition of the German foreign office to such marriages can prove a decidedly serious matter has been attested by numerous incidents, perhaps the most historic of which embodies the experience of the former Miss Helen Moulton, of New York, who married the late Count Paul von Hatzfeldt-Wildenburg, for many years prior to his death the German Ambassador to Great Britain. This marriage incurred the displeasure of Bismarck, who was prejudiced against such international unions. Another phase of the exactions of the German government threatened for a time the happy culmination of the ideal love story of the former Miss Langham of Kentucky and the late Baron Speck von Sternburg, a friend of former President Roosevelt, and late German Ambassador at Washington. However, the trouble was overcome, and the happy couple spent their honeymoon with the Roosevelts at the White House.

The present bride, in contrast to a majority of the American girls who make international marriages, has chosen the simplest form of wedding. The respective positions of Counselor Hoyt and Baron von Stumm in official Washington would have insured a spectacular wedding with all the glory of gold lace and officialdom on dress parade; but the prospective bride announced, soon after the engagement was known in January of this year, that she would be married quietly at her parents' home on Rhode Island Avenue, and would have no attendants. A reception has been planned to follow the wedding, but only the immediate families will be present at the ceremony. W. F.

TRAINING FOR USEFUL LIVES

Just Before School Hour

Some of the Buildings Where the Children Live

A "Care-taker" and Her Pickaninies

IN the open country, just south of the beautiful city of Augusta, Ga., there is an industrial orphanage which is doing, in its small way, a wonderful work toward saving the little colored children of the vicinity who have lost their parents, and bringing them up under such influences as will make them hard-working and respected members of the community in which they live. So well has this work there been done that the institution has no better friends than the white people of Augusta, and it has received favorable comment from the newspapers of the city.

A Little Helper and Her Charge

The Shiloh Industrial Orphanage, as the home is called, is the result of the efforts of a Christian negro, Daniel McHorton, who was a plantation slave in ante-bellum days and who still preserves many of the characteristics which we associate with the colored people of that day. He was not educated, but he was observing, and thought long and hard over the many problems in connection with the moral and spiritual welfare of his race, and he felt that in some way he must put his shoulder to the wheel and help make his people a necessary and respected part of the community. He believed strongly in the "gospel of work," and thought that if the young were taught simple trades, for which there would always be a demand, there would be a happier outlook for both white and black in the South.

McHorton determined at last to found an orphanage and take under its roof as many as possible of the homeless waifs of his race, of which there were many in the neighborhood, care for their souls as well as for their bodies; teach them enough of the "three R's" and a trade to enable them to face the world with some chance of success. It was an ambitious plan for a colored man who had no money, no rich or influential friends, but he was full of a faith which was destined to bring results. He bought some lands on credit, and a few small buildings were erected, and the first flock of orphans gathered. Daniel McHorton and his wife, better known as Aunt Silvy, struggled along at times almost unaided, at others with renewed courage because some kind white friend had sent them a gift of food or clothing, or some money, which lifted a little the weight of the heavy load they were carrying for the benefit of their race. Several times the little ship of their hopes seemed near shipwreck, but somehow they managed to keep on. In 1908 it seemed as if the work would have to be given up and the orphanage closed. The Augusta Chronicle, one of the enterprising newspapers of the South, took up the cause of the orphans and made a strong appeal to the citizens of Augusta, and the response was such that the orphanage was safe for at least a year.

The next year the people could not make the same generous response, as they were taking care of the flood sufferers, and again it seemed as if the good work must be given up. President Taft, however, happened to be spending some time at the Bon Air Hotel, near by, and he made a visit to the orphanage. It was the greatest day in Daniel McHorton's life, and it will be remembered by the orphans as long as they live. The President was shown over the place, and made a speech to the "chilluns." The chair in which he sat is now a venerated relic, referred to now and then by Mr. McHorton, his voice thrilling with pride and emotion.

"See dat yar chair," he will say to the visitor, "dat yar chair." The visitor gazes at it with interest. Daniel McHorton goes on with a flourish: "President Taft, he sat in dat yar chair, and it will be desecrated by generashuns yet to come."

The faces of the little "darky chilluns" standing about are filled with awe as they gaze at the chair for the hundredth time, and they are prepared to regard its four stout legs and capacious seat with great respect for years to come.

Commenting editorially on the visit, the Augusta Chronicle said: "Like most work of a particularly noble, self-sacrificing and worthy nature, it has attracted little attention except from those who come in direct contact with it; therefore it has necessarily limited its scope. But what would it be worth to the negroes of the South—the whites, too—if old Dan McHorton's power and opportunity for good could be extended? The Chronicle shall hope that this Presidential endorsement for Shiloh Orphanage, given by a man whose heart must be as big as his smile is broad, will be worth more to it in a practical way, than all the appeals that have been made for it by this paper, earnest and sincere as these have been."

The President on his return interested Mrs. Henry A. Strong, of Rochester, N. Y., and some other guests at the Bon Air, and they raised enough to save the school. The mortgage was paid off, and a new schoolhouse built, where classes and religious services could be held. A new dining-room and kitchen were built, and the old shacks made as comfortable as possible.

The institution has now been incorporated, with a regular board of trustees and with Mrs. Strong as president, and several prominent ladies in different parts of the country are enlisting public interest in this practical work at Augusta. One of its most prominent patrons is Mrs. W. J. Boardman of Washington, D. C., who is familiar with the orphanage and its needs, and is anxious to have one or two more buildings constructed.

Though the orphanage has been saved it is far from being as prosperous as it deserves for the unselfish Christian work which is being carried on there for the helpless little ones, who held such a strong hold on the heart of the Saviour of men and who should be regarded as a sacred trust by his followers. Though the buildings have been put in better condition there is always the question of food for the fifty little, but ravenous, mouths. Often Mr. McHorton does not know two days ahead where the provisions are coming from. Augusta merchants have been generous in their gifts of supplies, but of course this could not be looked upon as a permanent source of food. The orphanage is worthy the support of generous people everywhere and it is heartily endorsed by this paper. Communications or contributions may be sent to the treasurer, James L. Fleming, Augusta, Ga.

THE WHOLE WORLD LOVED HIM

MANY additional messages of sympathy and appreciation have been received during the week, both by the family of Dr. Klopsch and at the offices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The following letter was received from the Secretary of State, Hon. P. C. Knox:

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
"WASHINGTON, D. C., March 11.

"MADAM: The President directs me to inform you that he has received the following cablegram from the Viceroy of India:

"CALCUTTA, INDIA, March 9.

"PRESIDENT, U. S. AMERICA, WASHINGTON: Please accept on behalf of Indian empire, and convey to his family, sincere condolences on death of Louis Klopsch, whose munificent contributions for relief of distress during two severe famines can never be forgotten by government and people of India. (Signed) VICEROY.

"I am, madam, your obedient servant, "P. C. KNOX."

Irving Bacheller, the well-known novelist and author of Eben Holden, wrote to Mrs. Klopsch as follows: "I want you to know that I am one of the many who mourn for him with a sense of deep and irreparable loss. . . . I came to love him and to look up to him as a great-souled man—generous, brave, kind and masterful. He was very human, but he learned to rule his own spirit. He overcame evil with good. I have heard him speak of those who had sought to injure him in a tone that was kindly and forgiving, and then I have learned of some great service that he had rendered them. I have seen him when he rose to a stature beyond that of any man I have ever known, and when it seemed to me that he satisfied the dreams of saint and prophet. In my own days of trouble he stood by me like a brother, and I mourn for him—generous and kindly soul that he was. . . . It must comfort you to know that if every one he has befriended could lay a single flower upon his grave, the monument of Louis Klopsch would tower above all others!"

Rev. Frederick F. Shannon, Grace M. E. Church, Brooklyn, wrote: "As one of a great multitude who knew and loved him, both for what he was in himself and for what he wrought for our Lord, I send you my sincere sympathy."

Amelia E. Barr, the famous authoress, wrote: "I know that I have lost the best friend I had. He was a good man. There can be no higher praise than that; and, in his own way, he was a great man. There is no one to take his place. . . . I cannot see why this thing should have happened—no man in this place seemed more necessary than Dr. Klopsch. He was doing so much good."

Mr. D. W. McWilliams, of Brooklyn, wrote: "His departure is a loss to our city and nation not only but to the whole world. . . . Twenty years ago, Dwight L. Moody told me that Dr. Klopsch was a genius in the organization of benevolences. I have since seen multiplied evidences of it."

The managers and teachers of the orphanage at Sendai, Japan, where hundreds of little Japanese boys and girls—famine orphans—have been supported through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, sent a brief cablegram of sympathy.

The Armenian Progressive Association of New York sent this letter:

"By the death of Dr. Louis Klopsch not only America suffers a great loss, but also the entire human race. The loss will be felt especially in the most unfortunate country of modern times. In Dr. Klopsch Armenia had one of the best of her friends. It was through him that the American people sent a ray of hope and comfort to her in her darkest and most trying hour. When she was mourning the loss of her hundred thousand massacred children at that time of dejection and despondency, the efforts of Dr. Klopsch and of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD inspired her with hope and confidence in the future."

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH

The Ideal Christian Home

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

SEVERAL friends have lately written to the editor of this page, asking for a description of the ideal Christian home. To paint a picture which in every respect to the minutest detail shall satisfy every inquirer about the ideal home and meet the views of every critic is very nearly impossible. There are two or three points on which we shall all agree, and one or two statements that we may fearlessly make, conscious that no one will contradict them. The three words coming together—home, ideal and Christian—are a marvelous trio. Home means a great deal more than shelter from the elements, privacy from the world and the meeting place of the family. It includes these, but it means more. Home is the place to which we turn in absence with a longing that tears at the heart-strings. Homesickness is one of the diseases that cannot be cured by prescriptions written on a physician's blank. Home sets its impress for this life, and the life to come, on those who are raised amid its influences. Home is one of the sweetest words in our language.

Ideal sets before our thought that aiming at high things which redeems us from all that is sordid and mean. When we follow the gleam of light given to guide the soul we are reaching toward our ideal. If man, woman or child is destitute of ideality and lives only for the literal wants of each day the living is sure to be on a low plane.

Interwoven with the word Christian is everything that sanctifies life, hallows human intercourse and tends to nobleness and loveliness.

In the ideal Christian home Jesus Christ is the central figure. He is worshiped and served and imitated. Where Christ is set before the eyes of a household as the pattern to be copied, the Elder Brother to be loved, and the Saviour to be enthroned, the home is safe from pettiness, jealousy, envy and covetousness. An ideal home can hardly be found unless it be a Christian home.

Now to come to the practical outworking of daily life, of thought, word and act in an ideal Christian home, what do we find? First, justice for everybody; parents and children dwelling together in harmony. The children obey their parents from love and not from fear. The parents are not harsh in their discipline, tyrannical in their requirements or arbitrary in their demands. Husband and wife equally share the burdens of the road. There is no question of mine or thine, for what belongs to one belongs to the other, and this is true of the management of the joint income and of the work that must be done in the house, and of the guidance of the children.

The ideal home sustains and upholds both the school and the church. It has obligations to each and it fully meets them. In the ideal home the maid in the kitchen is a member of the family, and is treated as a friend and not as a hireling. Many problems that confront people needlessly in this relation are easily solved in the home where every person, from the oldest to the youngest, has a niche to fill and is allowed to fill it without the crushing of individuality. A home is not a penitentiary, a reformatory, or even a schoolroom. It is at once a castle and a nest, and the refuge and retreat of love.

HER SPINNING WHEEL

Moment by moment and hour by hour
The years of her life have flitted away.
Once she was fresh and fair as a flower;
Now she is bent and her hair is gray.

Oft as she spins her thoughts go back
To the time of her youth when life was new;
But she happily walks on the beaten track,
For life is good while there's work to do.

Two Golden Anniversaries

It is always a pleasure to chronicle the golden weddings that take place in the great circle of our CHRISTIAN HERALD subscribers. Every golden wedding anniversary bears witness to the faithful love of one man and one woman, who have stood together loyally for fifty years in the sacred companionship of wife and husband. Every golden wedding anniversary is a protest against the unrest and infidelity of modern life, that too often make divorce a menace to the body politic.

On April 8, 1859, in Paisley, Scotland, Mr. William Wilson and Miss Elizabeth Elliot were married. Paisley was the native place of both, and they lived there until 1888, when they crossed the ocean to make their home in Lowell, Mass. They have had eight children, of whom only two daughters survive. On the evening of April 8, 1909, their friends gathered in large numbers to offer congratulations, and they received a purse of gold, a mammoth cake and many beautiful gifts. A poem written by a friend in Paisley was read, and their pastor, Rev. J. M. Craig, made a pleasant address.

On the afternoon of April 8, 1909, Mr. and Mrs. John Raitt, Sr., who reside near Rising Sun, Neb., celebrated their golden wedding at the home of one of their sons. They were married fifty years ago in Arbroath, Scotland, and came to this country in 1863. They first settled in Illinois, and later went to Nebraska, where they still live. They have had eleven children, of whom eight are living. The afternoon passed without a flaw. Eighty dollars in gold were presented to Mr. and Mrs. Raitt, and they received a number of other beautiful tokens of regard. Seventy relatives were present at this delightful function. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sends its best wishes to both these wedded pairs.

Talking of Helpmeets

IN a suburban town, not very far from a great city, a small army of colored people have become almost indispensable to the comfort of the community. The social system would move on rustier hinges than it does but for the aid received from these genial, jolly though sometimes irresponsible folk, who are ready to beat rugs, wash windows, oil floors, sweep, dust, and in fact do anything that is required of them by householders. One humble servitor, daily coming to a certain household to attend to the furnace, shovel the snow and perform any necessary duty, was observed the other day to be in much haste to get back to his home. A question or two revealed the fact that the man's wife was ill, and that he was doing her work at home as well as his own outside. When he returned, after an interval of absence, his black face shone with pleasure as he said, "My wash is all out on the line, and you wouldn't find any whiter clothes in this town to-day than mine." Here was a helpmeet worth having.

A courtly gentleman, a half century ago, met the needs of his own home in a similar practical way. The home was in the country, and once in mid-winter, when the snow lay deep on the ground, the servants found the place too lonely for them and departed with short warning. No one was immediately found to replace them, and the man of the house, declaring that his fragile wife was not sufficiently strong to knead the bread for the family, made the bread himself, under her direction, and had great pride in the perfect loaves that emerged from the oven.

Why should not man know how to do woman's work, and now and then turn strong muscles and willing arms to account in the home?

Little Acts of Kindness

Among the little acts of kindness which used to be chronicled, and which lent beauty to commonplace living, was the sending of nice things to eat from neighbor to neighbor and friend to friend. A plate of rolls, covered by a snowy napkin, would go from one breakfast table to another; a bowl of loosened jelly or a delicious custard would form a tempting surprise to an invalid; and on many an occasion, when there was no special need for attention, a little tray, laden with delicacies, would arrive as a gift from one notable housewife to another. It is true that there are greater opportunities to-day for the purchase of every imaginable dainty than there may have been at a former period. Some of our friends would be amazed should we contribute to their table a loaf or cake from our baking, or in any other kindred fashion show them our good will, yet these little acts of kindness really sweetened life and helped people to know the good there was in unpretentious service.

Several years ago a Southern gentlewoman, transplanted from a soil where simple flowers of affection grew and thrived, ventured, in the simplicity of her heart, to send across the hall to an unknown neighbor in a large apartment house a plate of griddle-cakes, beautifully browned and toothsome. It was breakfast time, and one would have expected that the offering would be graciously received. On the contrary, it was misunderstood, and the plate was ungraciously sent back, as if the gift were an unwelcome intrusion. The second neighbor had not learned the alphabet of gracious receiving, which is as much an act of kindness as its counterpart of gracious giving.

The Strawberry Handkerchief

A Tale of Colonial Days in Old New York

By AMELIA E. BARR

CHAPTER EIGHT—Continued

WHEN Virginia awoke in the morning, she knew that her place and her work were waiting for her. True, she looked ill and miserable, but her father put down his cup of coffee, smiled as she entered the living-room, and said a frank and pleasant good-morning. He saw neither her pallor nor her air of suffering. He thought she had behaved with great decorum and discretion during the trying ordeal of the previous day, and he said so, adding, "Batavius was pleased with thy beauty." For the sake of her mother's warning glance, she did not answer as she wished to.

Fortunately, ere this clash of feeling found expression, Arent entered. He was in a state of great excitement, and he held a piece of paper.

"What have you got, Arent?" shouted the Captain.

"A mortal defiance, fader. Read it."

The Captain took the paper.

"Who wrote this paper, Arent?"

"No one knows."

"Where did you get this copy, Arent?"

"Harry Rutgers gave it to me."

"Hum—m—m!"

"Harry was in the City Hall yesterday afternoon when the Stamps came, and he told me the members of the Congress at once, without knowing what they were doing, leaped to their feet, and one of them cried out, 'We will not submit to an English Parliament; we will no more submit to Parliament than to the Divan at Constantinople!'"

"But wait, Jan! Wait, Arent!" cried Madame. "The paper! Tell us what is in it."

Arent took the paper and read aloud the message it bore with such fiery enthusiasm that every word seemed to be both a personal challenge and a separate threat:

Pro Patria.
The first man that either distributes, or makes use of Stampt Paper, let him take eare of his House, Person, and effeets.
Vox Populi.
We dare.

Arent turned to Virginia.

"My sister! My sister!" he said tenderly, drawing her close to him. "So sick and unhappy art thou! I see it. I have heard, dear one. Very cruel it was of Joris."

"Who told thee?"

"Harry. Joris went to Harry, and Harry said, 'Virginia is not to be blamed. She is as true as steel. I'll warrant her with my own honor.'"

"Oh, thou good brother! Thou knew what would comfort me; and with the words thou came."

"Arent!"

"Coming, moeder."

"I hate Batavius. I will die rather than marry him. Oh, Arent, how can I escape this horror?"

"If he is so dreadful to thee, thou shalt not marry him. I will put thee on the Manhattan and carry thee to the end of the world."

"Thou good, good brother!"

"Arent, thy father has gone," cried Madame impatiently.

"Coming, moeder! Keep thy strong heart, Virginia. A man so hateful to thee thou shalt not marry."

Then she kissed him in a flood of happy tears, whispering, "This is my kiss, and this; and this I give for Rose."

"Would she like thee to do that?"

"Yes."

"Why?"

"Because she loves thee."

"Arent! Arent!"

"Here I am, moeder," and he kissed her at the open gate, and then bounded after his father, who was hurrying down the Broadway as if the salvation of New York depended on his presence.

After Arent's departure, Virginia walked and worked as in a dream. It was as if suddenly a miracle had been worked in her affairs. Harry Rutgers had dropped a doubt into the angry jealousy of Joris, and the doubt would fret him to remembrance; he would not be able to put her quite out of his memory, and time might bring her the opportunity of explaining her false position. And Arent's sympathy and promise was a wonderful thing.

She dared not continue the reflections, and she went upstairs to put her room in order. For she had been shocked when she rose to find her white silk gown, and white stockings, and pink sandals, lying in a heap on the floor. On her dressing table the moonstones were scattered, and she also recalled the startling fact that she had left the precious Strawberry Handkerchief among the neglected garments.

As soon as her room was in perfect order, Virginia tried to face the day and its possibilities. The prospect was unbearable. Not only would she have to meet Batavius with some show of courtesy, but there was sure also to be a rush of visitors of all kinds. The scene at the dinner party made by the indignant Joris would be the general topic of conversation. How was she to answer the ill will, the curiosity, the sarcasm, or even the friendly sympathy she would be compelled to listen to?

Happily Madame settled the question for her. "Virginia," she said, as she stood in the renovated room and saw in its order the sign of her daughter's ability to grapple with circumstances, "Virginia, you are sick this day. Come not downstairs. My dear one, put on your nightgown, and tell your sorrow to your pillow. Much comfort can come that way, yes, and good counsel also."

"Moeder, moeder! So good are you! I know not how I could bear the people who will call to-day."

"Bear them! Thou could not bear them. To me they may speak their mind, and if their speech is not good, I have the years to reprove it."

"If my little wheel I might have, moeder?"

"Yes, that is good. Turn thy wheel and thy thoughts quietly together, and peace and strength may come in its soft burring."

"I see not which way to turn, moeder."

"Well, then, stand still and leave thy troubles alone; think not of them, others will think for thee."

So she left her daughter comforted and encouraged, satisfied that the little wheel and the day's solitude would bring her the strength necessary for the morrow. And she was herself in just that half-defiant mood which smiles at the prospect of opposition, being not only ready for the encounter, but pleased that it should take place.

All the early morning hours she faced it, meeting every fresh attack with a smiling unconcern, unless when it was necessary to tear the sting from envy, or the veil from those hearts wickeder than all others—the hearts which rejoice in evil. But as the day grew toward noon, there was a lull; for, in spite of the Stamp Act, dinners were an important event, and Katrina and her callers were alike compelled to prepare for it. But in Katrina's case

Use cold cream if you want to. It has its value.

But to clean the skin, you must use soap: pure soap: Ivory Soap.

Never mind if it does cost only a few cents a cake. It is infinitely purer than most soaps that sell for five times its price.

Use a soft cloth and hot water—to open the pores, allowing dust and dirt to make their way out. Dip the cloth into the water and rub on it some Ivory Soap. Souse the skin well for almost or quite five minutes. Rinse with cold water; cold water closes the pores and makes the skin firm.

There is no "free" (uncombined) alkali in Ivory Soap. That is why it will not injure the finest fabric or the most delicate skin.

Water Does Not Harm Liquid Floor Wax

Here at last is a floor wax with no disadvantages, yet one that finishes floors to perfection. It is Columbus Hard Drying Liquid Wax—the only liquid wax on the market. Water doesn't turn it white. Children can jump on it and no marks are made except where the wood underneath is dented.

No Grease—No Paraffine

It forms a tough elastic film of great hardness. It is the most sanitary floor finish because it doesn't catch and hold dust and germs, being free from all greasy substances. The floor can't spot. We use only the finest hard French Wax.

Done in Less Than an Hour—No Labor

It takes less than an hour from the time the can is opened to have the floor finished and ready to walk on.

And there is no pushing of a heavy polishing brush—no backache—no dissatisfied servants—yet the lustre it gives isn't equaled by any other floor wax made.

One Gallon Covers 2,500 to 3,000 Square Feet

Columbus Liquid Wax goes much farther than common wax does, so it is by far the most economical. It requires refinishing only a few times a year. Many of the largest hotels and hospitals are using it now exclusively.

Send for Sample

Send 4c in stamps to cover postage and packing and we'll send you free a liberal sample bottle of the wax and our book on the Care of Floors. Try the sample on a floor or piece of furniture. You can use it on pianos, fine furniture and all kinds of woodwork where a high lustre is wanted. Equally good on hard or soft wood floors. At all first class dealers in Half-pint Cans 25c—Pints 45c—Quarts 85c—Half-gallons $1.60—Gallons $3.00. [24] the was meat in plenty left from yesterday's feast, and some time before noon she was sitting with her knitting in her hand, the comfort of a Dutch Psalm singing in her heart, and the echo of it on her lips.

Sooner than Madame Van Vroom expected, Jansen returned home. She knew there was anger in his step, and as soon as she lifted her eyes to his she saw it on his face. But she did not allude to the fact. She was determined that for once Jansen should ask for her sympathy. Why this little bit of awkwardness seemed at that hour good for her she could not have told. It was a most unusual mood, an absolute reversion of their ordinary attitude. Nevertheless, in spite of all Jansen's efforts to make her notice his troubled condition, she remained oblivious. He kicked off his street shoes with unnecessary vigor, and she quietly pushed his slippers toward him, and made no remark about his temper. He asked crossly for a drink of water, and she gave it. In short, for twenty minutes she was a Katrina so provokingly calm, so believably inattentive to him, that he wondered with constantly increasing irritation what was the matter with her. At length he asked sharply:

'Art thou cross, Katrina?"

'No, my Jan," she answered sweetly.

'Most thou not see that I am cross?"

'With whom art thou cross?"

'With the Governor, and also with Batavius."

Then Katrina let her knitting fall to her lap, and asked, "How came thou across the Governor? He is not in thy way."

'Purposely to see him, I went."

'Such foolishness!"

'It was for Virginia's sake. I thought as yesterday's affair went so well I would follow luck with more luck."

'Only ill luck was there yesterday."

'Not so. It was good luck to get rid of that Artaveldt boy, and while yet Virginia was angry at him it would be better luck to get the marriage over."

'Virginia's marriage?"

'Yes."

'She was promised until the eighteenth of November."

'But I say, I thought it best to get the marriage over. So to the Governor I went for a license."

"Well, then, what came of thy visit?"

"Hard it was to reach him, and when I did so, with a splutter of bad words he met me. I could not make any sense of them."

"Scotch, no doubt."

"Scotch, or no Scotch, they were bad words. He said—plain enough: 'You are a spy, Captain Van Vroom; to spy out the state of the fort you have come.' And I answered politely, 'Governor, you lie. For a marriage license for my daughter, I come.' And he said he would not give me one. I might wait for the Stamp license. And I said my daughter should not be married by a stamped paper; and I told him very plainly it was his paid duty to give me a license; and he said it was out of his duty, for the new Governor was at hand, and I was to be."

"Oh, Jan! Why did thou put thyself in the way of his insults?"

"I wanted what he could give me. As for his bad words, I told him to say as many as he liked in good Dutch or English. He grinned and asked who my daughter was to marry; when I told him Captain De Vries, into another passion he went; and said he would not give me a license for all the gold in New York; and I said New York was left so poor by the government, I could perhaps better that offer then he began to pity Virginia, and to sneer at Batavius, and I told him that he had nothing to do with my family, and his opinions I wanted not. I wanted a license. Something else I said,—perhaps I did not pick nor choose my words,—and he called me a traitor, and I called him a turncoat, and I told him a turncoat was the meanest sinner in existence.

"And very likely I did say something worse, for I was in the hands of two soldiers, and then out of the fort, and out of every kind of temper for an hour or two, and knew not whether I was Jansen Van Vroom, or Jansen somebody else."

"And in that hour or two, where did thou keep thyself?"

"In my own place. I went to 14 Wall Street, and shut myself up with the wild, raging creature that had been christened Jansen Van Vroom. I talked reasonably to it, and promised it satisfactions, and so got it to be a little reasonable, and come to understanding. Then in marched Batavius. Yes, he marched in, as if he was at the head of an army, and my head was aching, and I said—perhaps a little crossly—'Make some less noise, Batavius. Thy big feet stamp. Is not walking good enough for thee?' Then he too had rough words ready, and far from respectful words they were."

"Very often lately, he has talked to thee as if he were master of all things. Thy own fault it is, Jan; too kind art thou. What talk was between you?"

"I told him I had been to see the Governor about the marriage license. I thought that would please him. Power of God! He fell into a rage that would have sweat a fiend. He said I made enemies for him—that I was destroying his business—his business, Katrina—he said that. He vowed I was hated by all the respectable people in the city, and what for, he asked, had I meddled with his marriage license? It was not my business, and so on, and so on, worse and worse. And, Katrina, I was dumb with the something in my throat, when he stamped himself away, with a last bit of insulting advice—to remember that I was only old Jansen Van Vroom, a busybody whom nobody particular minded. Oh, Katrina! Katrina!"

"My poor Jan! My dear Jan! The ungrateful creature might have killed thee."

The "Pioneer" Sleeping Car

UNTIL the last year of the Civil War there were no sleeping cars in this or any other country. If people were traveling continuously for a week they had to sit up in the stiff seats and make themselves as comfortable as possible in the circumstances.

In 1864 a sleeping car called the "Pioneer" was built in the shops of the Chicago and Alton Railroad. It cost $18,000 to build. It was a foot wider than the usual coach of the day and two and one-half feet higher. The berths were hinged. When President Lincoln was assassinated the new car was suggested as the proper vehicle to carry the body of the martyred President to Springfield, Ill., as it was the finest car in America. It was too high, however, to pass under the ordinary bridges and wide for the station platforms. These obstructions were at once altered to allow the funeral car to pass. Other cars were soon built, and the sleeping car soon ceased to be considered a novelty and was adopted by most American roads, though Europe was slow in taking it up.

Though Colonel Roosevelt travels as a private American citizen, he has been the recipient of all the honors which the Egyptian government could devise for its distinguished guest and his family. The Sirdar, General Sir Reginald Wingate, met him far up the river, and escorted him to the city. Colonel Roosevelt was delighted to get ashore, as he had traveled for 1,300 miles on a small launch since February 20. The Sirdar's staff was in uniform. Colonel Roosevelt was in khaki and wore a pith helmet. Thousands of Egyptians gave him a respectful and cordial greeting. He visited Gordon College, built as a memorial to the hero of the Soudan. He also visited the spot where General Gordon fell. He showed an accurate and intimate knowledge of the desperate struggle and the battles in the vicinity, for Gordon has always been one of his heroes. He also went five miles below the city, to Omdurman, where Kitchener defeated the forces of the Mahdi, going over the battlefield on camel-back. His wife and family accompanied him, escorted by Soudanese cavalry.

—KAISER WILHELM is a monarch of many accomplishments. A few days ago he directed a grand opera rehearsal for five consecutive hours, punctuating the performance with frequent suggestions to the singers and giving hints as to the details of stage presentation and orchestra work. This is not the first time he has acted as practical patron of the German musical world. We have him now in the varied roles of painter, musical composer and impresario, preacher, and occasionally pastor of his own flag-ship, in addition to the usual duties of state. He is a most assiduous worker, and keeps in touch with all the leading details of the empire.

—IN Trier, Germany, a giant airship, designed by Herr Anton Border, an engineer, is nearing completion. It is a startling innovation in airship construction, as it is being built of iron. Count Zeppelin, it will be remembered, tried one with a rigid aluminum body, and this follows in its general lines the Zeppelin model. The frame is of hollow iron pipe; the central shaft is 410 feet in length. The gas is held in twelve small balloons. They are twenty-seven feet long and forty feet in diameter. They are fastened end to end along the length of the ship. Five motors will generate 480 horse-power. These motors will send the ship through the air at the rate of forty-four miles an hour, perhaps even faster. The entire ship weighs thirty tons, and it will be able to carry ten tons of freight or fifty or sixty passengers.

A Strange Ride

DOLLY and Marion went up into the pasture one day for a little cnic. They carried a full supply of ndwiches, cookies, cake, and apples. was a beautiful day and they were in gh spirits.

"It is a longer way to the spring an I thought it was," grumbled olly, as they toiled up the steep hill. "It wouldn't seem so long if the sun in't burn so," Marion reminded her. "What a lot of cows and calves there e in the pasture!" remarked Dolly.

"Yes," said Marion, as they finally proached the spring, "and they seem be coming, all of them, to get some ter from the spring, just when we e."

"Let's hurry and fill our cups and t away from them, suggested Dolly, o would not admit that she was raid of cows, being nearly fourteen ars old, but who did not relish their mpany very well after all.

"But where shall we go?"

The girls searched the pasture with ger eyes, but the only woods in sight ere rods and rods above them. They lt that they could not climb up there.

Suddenly Marion spied nearby an pty barrel, almost as large as a gshead. One end only was headed . It lay on its side.

"Let's crawl in there and eat our nch," she cried.

"The ground is sort o' slanting there. hat if the barrel should roll down hill to that little pond?" objected Dolly.

"Oh, there isn't a bit of danger if we ep still,—and it looks so nice and ol in there!"

Into the barrel they crept and were errily eating their lunch, when there as a sudden tumult among the calves.

"What's that?" cried Marion, turng hastily around to look out, and rgetting all about "keeping still."

In an instant the big barrel began roll. Over and over went the little rls, bumping first on one side and en on the other, amid a confused ass of cake and sandwiches. Faster d faster went the barrel, until at st it landed in the muddy pool into hich the rill from the spring flowed.

Then Dolly and Marion picked themlves up, a little bruised and dizzy, t not seriously hurt, and waded out the shallow water.

They did not like it very much that erybody, especially their brothers, nt into spasms of laughter over eir adventures. They had not seemed ry funny to the girls themselves.

But it was a great ride.

Wild Honey

TWO little sisters were very fond of roaming through the woods. They ere only ten and eight years old, but ey knew more about the wood-flowers d trees and animals than do most own people.

One day they were passing through forest further away from their home an those in which they generally ayed, when they saw a peculiar lookg tree.

It was not very high, and it seemed be nearly dead. A hole could be ainly seen near the top of it, and in d out of this hole, thousands of bees ere constantly passing. Their yellow dies shone like gold in the sunshine, d as the girls stood still, watching em, the sound of their buzzing emed to fill the whole forest.

"It is a bee tree," they decided. "It ay be full of delicious honey."

When they told their father about it was greatly interested.

"I should like nothing better than to ther the honey from a bee tree," he id, "and I will take you girls and ur brother with me."

As soon as he could get time, he ok them all in a wagon to the forest, carrying with him a large quantity of paper, an ax, a saw, two pans, a mosquito net, a tablespoon, and a ladder.

About ten rods from the tree, he tied the horse. Then he put the ladder up against the tree, and mounting it, stuffed the large knot-hole tightly full of paper.

Then he and his son sawed the tree down.

It contained a good supply of honey. With the spoon it was scooped out, and the two large pans were filled to overflowing.

The girls were very proud to have been the ones to discover the bee tree.

Eyestones

IN these modern days we do not hear much about eyestones, but in olden times every family kept them on hand.

They are little stones of about the size of a pea, only flat. If a cinder flies into the eye, the eyestone is put in. It should be moistened before insertion.

It starts usually at the inner corner of the eye and it works its way toward the outer corner.

Sometimes an eyestone seems to lose its power of movement. It can then be enlivened by putting it into a little dish of strong vinegar. This course will always show whether or not the eyestone is in good order, for if it is, it will move swiftly around the dish.

Eyestones are usually made from fishbones. They are sandpapered so that they will be perfectly smooth. They are efficacious, and it is not easy to understand why they have gone so largely out of use.

Train Your Memory

IN these days, when people read newspapers daily, making little effort to remember what they read, it is said that the art of remembering is going into a decline.

Now a good memory is a wonderful help in life. If you try to develop yours in your youth, you will never regret it.

The most successful pastor is usually he who most quickly recognizes and calls by name the members of his flock.

The most successful politician is usually the one who remembers best the men whom he meets.

Writers, speakers, lawyers, doctors, merchants and most others, depend largely on their memories for their advancement. There is no high place on earth for the forgetful man.

There have been many great characters who have declared that they owe their fame chiefly to their remarkable memories.

James G. Blaine was one of these. George Washington had a good memory. Napoleon was said to be able at one time to call every soldier in his army by name.

Milton could repeat the whole of Homer's works. Several men have committed the entire Bible to memory. Henry Clay could not learn poetry, but he never forgot a name, a face, or an argument. John Stuart Mill had a wonderful memory. Oliver Cromwell was another general who was said to know the names of all his men.

Probably Macaulay had as good a memory as any man that ever lived. He knew by heart the whole of Paradise Lost and The Pilgrim's Progress.

Make a practice of learning both prose and poetry. Then repeat it often to yourself, in order to retain it. Train your memory in every way you can think of.

A good memory will not take the place of original thinking, nor of industry, nor of energy; but it is still a very valuable help in life. In these days of close competition a good memory is always likely to be the factor which turns the scale toward victory.

To Keep Your Floors Beautiful

Every woman knows how annoying it is to have unsightly spots, water stains, dirt stains and foot-tracks spoil the beauty of her floors, stairs and woodwork. They ruin the beauty of her entire home.

Will you test, at our expense,

Johnson's Kleen Floor

the only preparation for immediately removing all these discolorations? With Johnson's Kleen Floor any woman can keep her floors bright and clean—like new.

Simply dampen a cloth with Kleen Floor and rub it over the floor. Instantly, all spots, stains and discolorations disappear—without the slightest injury to the finish.

Johnson's Kleen Floor rejuvenates the finish—brings back its original beauty—greatly improves the appearance of all floors, whether finished with Shellac, Varnish or other preparations.

Johnson's Kleen Floor is quickly applied—two hours is ample time in which to thoroughly clean the floor, wax it and replace the rugs.

We want to send you, free, sample bottle of Johnson's Kleen Floor and a package of Johnson's Wax to be used after Kleen Floor is applied.

Johnson's Prepared Wax gives the floors that soft, lustrous, artistic polish which does not show heel-marks or scratches and to which dust and dirt do not adhere.

It is ideal for polishing woodwork, furniture, pianos, etc. All that is necessary is to occasionally apply it with a cloth and then bring to a polish with a dry cloth.

Your floors receive harder wear than any other part of your woodwork, hence require special treatment. Kleen Floor will keep them always in perfect condition.

We want to send you, free, prepaid, samples of our Kleen Floor and Prepared Wax, together with the latest edition of our handsomely illustrated book on the "Proper Treatment of Floors, Woodwork and Furniture." We attach a coupon for your convenience.

MESSENGERS FOR CHRIST*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

"HE called unto him his twelve disciples, and gave them authority." He had called them before, at the time he preached the Sermon on the Mount, and they had been attending "a school of methods" by going everywhere with Jesus, listening to his words and seeing his wonderful works of healing. They were now to be sent out as workers, and so had special divine grace given to them. We are not told how it was conferred: by the word of Jesus, or by the laying on of his hands, or by the gift of the Holy Spirit. The record of their deeds is: "They cast out many demons, and anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them" (Mark 6:13).

What the Master wants now is to have us go out and work for him. Some one has said: "One-tenth of our church members are doing all of the work, while the other nine-tenths do nothing." If that is the case, then a very great number of people are missing the joy of service. There is no joy like it.

My gracious Lord, I own thy right
To every service I can pay,
And call it my supreme delight
To hear thy dictates and obey.

What is my being but for thee,
Its sure support, its noblest end?
'Tis my delight thy face to see,
And serve the cause of such a Friend.
PHILIP DODDRIDGE.

God knows what is in men before he calls them. When God first called Moses to be the deliverer of Israel, Moses pleaded: "O Lord, I am not eloquent; I am slow of speech." But Moses went forward and did his duty, God helping him.

In Dresden, among the royal jewels of the house of Saxony, is a wonderful silver egg. A spring is touched, and the egg opens, and a golden yolk is brought to view; another spring is touched, and a jeweled chick is revealed; another spring is touched, and the crown of Saxony in miniature appears. A last spring is touched, and the ring of royal authority is disclosed. We may take this unique jewel as an illustration of the hidden possibilities that are in every one's life. These possibilities are opened up as through obedience to Christ we press the springs.

The Apostles Sent Out

"Now the names of the twelve apostles are these." Among them were three groups of two brothers—James and John, sons of Zebedee; Peter and Andrew, sons of Jonas, and James and Thaddeus, sons of Alpheus. The other six men—Philip, Bartholomew (Nathanael), Thomas, Matthew, Simon (Zelotes) and Judas Iscariot—had no brothers in the apostolic group. Jesus sent them out two by two, so that they might take counsel together, and supplement each other's work. We are not to suppose that Peter must have been appointed with Andrew, or James with his brother John. Jesus undoubtedly yoked together those whom he know could work together best. It may have been that Philip, who was slow of thought, may have been paired with Nathanael, who was quick-witted. Thomas, the doubting one, may have been joined with Matthew, who was a hero of faith. Possibly Peter, the impetuous one, was coupled with Andrew, who was careful and far-seeing. Ever since it seems to have been God's plan to send out workers in pairs: Moody and Sankey, Whittle and Bliss, Torrey and Alexander, etc.

So when two work together, each for each
Is quick to plan and can the other teach;
But when alone one seeks the best to know,
His skill is weaker and his thoughts are slow.

"Go not into any way of the G- tiles." "Enter not into any city of Samaritans." Certainly not beca of prejudice, but because the Gos would have been hindered had th done so. The time had not yet co for establishing missions to the G- tiles. That work was to come la when their own hearts were m ready for it.

Just before Jesus ascended to hea he gave his apostles their world-w commission, when he said, "Go ye i all the world and preach the Gospe every creature." And that is the w which the successors of the apos- missionaries now have before th "Send me anywhere, provided it be 1- ward," said David Livingstone.

"From where the darkness is dark comes to the Church of Christ the c to dare and do," said Alexan Mackay.

The Other Lost Sheep

"I do not know that I shall live see a single convert, but I would leave my present field of labor to made a king of the greatest empire the globe," said Adoniram Judson.

"I would that I had a thousand li and a thousand bodies, that I mi devote them all to no other empl- ment than preaching the Gospel those who have never heard the joy sound," said Robert Moffatt.

"Go rather to the lost sheep of house of Israel." The Jews had b for generations under tutelage to - ceive the Gospel—even from the t of Moses, their law-giver—and bef that, when God had separated Al- ham from his kinsfolk that he mi make of him a great nation of "cho people." But the Jews had bec "lost sheep" by falling into the i- atrous ways of the people who inh- ited the Promised Land when they t possession of it. Jesus' first work s that of a special missionary to Jews—as their Messiah they had been expecting him. But, alas! even to-day will they acknowledge t he has come. They are still " sheep."

And there are other lost sheep! It is said that in India, China, Japan Korea are massed 700,000,000 of i- aters, or about half of the world's p- ulation. Dr. William Arthur dre a picture of a circle, and made one-h of it black to represent heathenism Southern and Eastern Asia, and t he wrote:

"Of every two infants in the w one first sees the light in heathen A To what instruction is it born?

"Of every two brides one offers vows there. To what affection is destined?

"Of every two families one spre its table there. What love unites t circle?

"Of every two widows one is lam- ing there. What consolation soothe her?

"Of every two orphan girls on wandering there. What charities protect her?

"Of every two wounded conscie one is trembling there. What ba what physician does it know?

"Of every two men that die on departing there. What shore is in eye?

"The Christ who died for through his free Gospel, blesses fants, cherishes brides, cheers the f- ily circle, comforts the widow, c for the orphan, heals the wounded science and places heaven before gaze of the dying."

"Preach, saying, The kingdom heaven is at hand." Jesus gave t their message. It was simple direct, arousing and inspiring.

*International Sunday School Lesson for April 10, 1910. The Mission of the Twelve. Matt. 9:35—10:15, 40-42. GOLDEN TEXT: "Freely ye have received, freely give." Matt. 10:8.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

wd needed preachers then, and it ns them to-day. There is but one Cl stian minister to every 114,000 pe ons in Japan, one in 165,000 in Indi one in 220,000 in Africa, and one in 37,000 in China. God gives the sa e theme to all of his missionaries. E n a deaf and dumb missionary may pr ent the glorious theme.

The Writing on the Sand lady missionary in India had gone to peak to the people in a neighboring vi ge. She had taken with her a Hdu girl who was deaf and dumb. Tl people gathered round out of curios at first, but some began to oppose ar tried to make a tumult. "My frds," began the lady, but a dozen voes cried out and drowned her wds. "What shall I do?" she thght. Meanwhile, the noise incr sed. Something must be done, and do quickly. "Write on the sand 'Gl is love,'" she signed to the Hindu gi beside her. First the little deaf ar dumb girl expressed the words on he fingers, and then she wrote them on the ground. When she began a gnt hush fell on the crowd, and they wched her in silence as she inscribed "Gd is love" in large letters in the sal. Of course the text was in Hinduani. "See what this girl has writte for you to read," said the lady. "Speak to her. She is deaf and dumb, as you will at once discover." Several cae timidly forward and spoke to the chl. One or two came forward and rel the words. "Let others come," sa the lady. In a long line the peoplof the village walked past the text in he sand and read it. Then they fored a ring round the lady and the de and dumb child, and sat down to beaught. And some of them on that ve day began to serve the true God.

"Freely ye have received, freely gi." What a privilege to have had Jes for a teacher! And what a rsponsibility it placed upon those who ha been taught by him! How could th do enough and say enough to pass alg the benefit received? Since the das of the apostles there have been my faithful preachers and teachers w have tried to give freely what they ha received; notably Rowland Hill, w averaged three hundred and fifty sermons a year to his eighty-ninth ye. And John Wesley nearly twice as many—40,560 as against 22,291. Whitefield preached 18,000 sermons. Clrles Wesley wrote 5,000 hymns. H hath done what he could, she ha done what she could, might be spken of many earnest Christian wkers. And none of them ever think they have paid in full the debt of love they owe.

A story is told of a man in Minnesota living in a beautiful mansion, which had a lighthouse on the top. He was asked why he had put it there, and he replied that many years before, when traveling home across the prairie, a terrible snowstorm overtook him. He was just lying down to die when he saw a light in the distance. He made for it, and it brought him to a log cabin. Thus his life was preserved. Afterward he built a house, and set a light on it that it might guide to safety other lost travelers.

A Glorious Privilege

The following story has a similar thought in it: A man traveling on a ship at sea was very seasick. Suddenly there was a cry, "Man overboard!" The seasick fellow in his cabin was too ill to go on deck to help in the rescue, but he thought he could crawl to the porthole and hold a bull's eye lantern there. By and by the drowning man was rescued, and when he was brought on deck and recovered his consciousness he said that he was sinking the third time when he saw a light gleaming through a porthole, and by its light he saw a hand which he gripped and so was saved.

What a glorious privilege it is to be a light in the world to save others. Let us shine for Jesus!

"Get you no gold, nor silver, nor brass in your purses." That is, carry no money with you for your expenses, no large amount, as gold; nor small amount, as silver; nor even "brass" (copper), the smallest coins made. That was Jesus' way of making them dependent upon love. By kind words and kind deeds they could coin "love," and that is, after all, the best interchange.

"No wallet for your journey." It was a leather bag made of goat or sheepskin, in which to carry bread, olives, figs, etc. It was and is now generally used in that region. Jesus meant by this injunction that they were to be pensioners on the bounty of friends they made on their journey. The milk of human kindness was to flow for them.

"Neither two coats," lest their journeying should be impeded by luggage.

"Nor shoes, nor staff." They were not, however, to go barefooted, which would have made their way slow and painful. Only they were not to wear shoes, which were a kind of luxury, but simply sandals—soles fastened on with leather thongs, to protect their feet against stones and clods of earth.

ADVERTISERS STRIVE TO PLEASE

SINCE the appearance of our Advertising Talk, entitled "Every Subscriber a Co-editor," we have received a great number of letters, which convince us that taking our readers into our confidence concerning our advertising columns was a move in the right direction. We have unearthed a number of complaints, which very likely would never have been made were it not for the appearance of our guarantee, and we are glad to say that in most cases we have been able to adjust differences which have occurred. In many cases, we have found that the subscriber and not the advertiser was at fault, due to misunderstanding, etc.

In this connection we wish to call our readers' attention to the fact that advertisers, as a rule, will go to almost any amount of trouble to please their customers, and our investigations of certain cases show that some of these advertisers take pains with customers sometimes out of all proportion to the merits of the case.

We have also had many complaints from subscribers who have not received goods for which money had been sent to advertisers, and who immediately called our attention to these advertisers, branding them as frauds. When we came to investigate these cases, we found that the delay in most instances was due to an extra rush of business on the part of the advertiser, who had not had the time to get around to the complaining subscribers particular purchase.

Readers must remember that hundreds of orders may sometimes result from a small advertisement. And so we would suggest, in every case, that the reader be sure to bring the matter to the advertiser's attention before submitting it to us. Then, if satisfaction is not obtained, the subscriber will be justified in calling our attention to our guarantee as follows:

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD guarantees its advertisements. Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within one month of the date of the appearance of the advertisement.

How Painted Floors Are Kept New

When paint is subjected to wear, as you know, it is usually covered with varnish.

Carriages, automobiles, railway cars, farm implements—they are all varnished over the paint.

A painted floor has the hardest use of all. It calls for a special heel-proof varnish, and that varnish is called ELASTICA Floor Finish.

There is only one floor finish which actually meets the requirements, and we have spent forty years in perfecting it. That finish always bears this trade-mark:

TRADE ELASTICA MARK.

"It is therefore not only in the name of the Armenian Progressive Association, but also on behalf of the entire Armenian race, that we come to express our appreciation of the man, our gratitude for his noble efforts and our sorrow for the loss which humanity suffers by his death.

"We also beg to express through you our condolences to Mrs. Klopsch, and assure her that thousands of grateful Armenian widows will participate in her grief for the loss of the man so noble and the Christian so true.

"THE ARMENIAN PROGRESSIVE ASSOCIATION,
"H. M. DADOURIAN, President.
"M. S GABRIEL, Secretary."

Missionary Z. Charles Beals, of China (now in this country), writes from San Francisco, Cal.: "How can we spare one who has been such a blessing to mankind? His death will bring sadness not only to all our missionaries in China, but also to millions of the Chinese who have learned to love and honor him. May God comfort the widow and family with the comfort wherewith he alone can comfort his children. I shall ever praise God that I came to know Dr. Klopsch many years ago, and he proved a true friend to me."

The Camp Memorial (Congregational) Sunday School, Brooklyn, Rev. William James, pastor, adopted a resolution of sympathy, which was directed to be sent to Mrs. Klopsch.

Fanny Crosby's Tribute

Fanny J. Crosby, Bridgeport, Conn., the well-known hymn composer, wrote: "In the death of Dr. Klopsch we have lost a friend whose memory will always be precious to the countless number of those befriended by him during his life; one whose place it will be hard to fill."

Rev. C. H. Mead, editor of the National Advocate, wrote: "Human suffering, from whatever cause, was repugnant to him, and he followed a divine command to do all he could to relieve it. He was the friend of humanity, regardless of nationality or creed. The large family of readers of his great paper believed in him, and well they might. He claimed none of the glory of it for himself, but gave God the praise and his readers the credit of it all. The men on the Bowery — wrecked, ruined, discouraged, slaves of drink and sin—believed in him, for they knew that in the darkest night, and the coldest weather, and the fiercest storm, a beacon star shone bright and clear at the Bowery Mission, kept shining through his benefaction, and made it impossible for even the worst one in the crowd to say, 'No man careth for my soul.' The children of the tenements and missions of the big city believed in him, for at Mont-Lawn they came to see and know and love him. They knew he was their friend, and he knew they were his friends. Oh, how he loved Mont-Lawn, and how he loved those children! We suspect that greater sorrow over his death could nowhere be found than among those children, unless it be among his own, and among us who knew him well and loved him deeply. He lives in the hearts of thousands. He gave himself for others. He was honored by presidents, kings, princes; but that weighed little with him compared with his being honored by the King of Glory. A great man has fallen, but yet he lives. Are we mistaken in believing that the great family of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers will endow the two charities which had such a big place in his heart?"

Rev. Leander Trowbridge Chamberlain, D.D., of New York, wrote: "His passing away from this home, his office, his local philanthropies, his world-wide Christian plans and efforts, appears to me, in its suddenness, like the daybreak ceasing at the dawn. . . . I shall go to him, but he will not come again to me. We shall not meet at either Sunnytop or the Children's Home. . . . They who know of the 'house with many mansions,' and who have seen the gates of the city open for the entrance of those whom they have loved, will be constrained to look up rather than down, and they will testify to the 'love divine, all love excelling.' Our treasures, our loved ones—those whom Christ has claimed as his own—are not taken away, but are just shepherded and folded, and the Shepherd himself never withdraws his presence and care."

Rev. Dr. Buckley's Condolence

Rev. J. M. Buckley, D.D., editor of the New York Christian Advocate, wrote from Morristown, N. J.: "I expected Dr. Klopsch to live to four score; but our Father knows what, and when, and where, and why. The first three we see; the last will be unveiled only on the other side of the drapery which separates us from heaven. . . . He was the embodiment of the Good Samaritan, come back from his long sleep to help the helpless."

Commander Evangeline Booth, of the Salvation Army, wrote: "Dr. Klopsch's kind associations with our work at different periods made us acquainted with him in more than a merely official connection, and we realize his loss to the Christian world. May the consolation of Jesus, whose tender hands can touch without hurting the sorest places of our grief, be continually with you in this shadowed hour, amid the fragrance of which you will remember the many blessings the Doctor's life and work have brought to thousands."

Mr. Will R. Moody, eldest son and successor of the late Evangelist Dwight L. Moody, wrote to Mrs. Klopsch: "I am returning North from attendance upon a Bible Conference in Atlanta, where your loss and that of the Christian Church was indeed lamented. I owe a lasting debt of gratitude to Dr. Klopsch for many kindnesses, both personal and in behalf of our work."

Called Higher

Mrs. C. B. Seighton, of Presque Isle, Me., died November 21, 1909, after a few days' illness.

Entered into rest December 2, 1909, Joseph V. K. Wells, of Milford, Del. A constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD since its first year.

Mrs. Julia A. Fish, of Washington, D. C., who for nearly twenty years was a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, went to the better land on June 19, 1908, having attained the age of eighty-six years.

Mrs. Anna A. Jamison, of Ophir, Calif., passed to her heavenly home January 19, 1910. She was a constant subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for twenty years. She was active in church work for over seventy years.

Charles W. Phillips, a life-long resident of Saratoga Springs, N. Y., and a deacon in the First Baptist Church, died February 4, 1910, at the residence of his daughter, Mrs. John V. Poler, Southampton, Mass., in his seventy-third year. Mr. Phillips had been for many years a member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family.

Daniel Wood Mersereau, one of the oldest readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, passed away September 2, 1909. He was the son of John Van Horne and Margaret Wood Mersereau, and grandson of Judge Lawrence Mersereau, the first judge to sit on the bench of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick. He was born at Oromocto, N. B., May 23, 1825. His grandparents landed in St. John, N. B., in 1783, coming from Staten Island, N. Y. Some of the family are still living on the island, which at one time was almost wholly owned by the Mersereau family. Mr. Mersereau spent sixty-six years of his life in Blissville, N. B. He was a man of sterling character and strong Christian faith. He loved THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and frequently said, "It is the best paper printed." Four daughters are left to mourn the loss of a kind father.

In the Divine Presence*

THERE is a book called The Practice of the Presence of God. "If you believe that God is always with you," says Dr. J. R. Miller, "practise it. Act as if you realized it. You could not do a mean thing, nor think an unholy thought, if you saw Christ beside you. You know that he is beside you. Practise his presence. You will find wondrous power in this practice. That is what religion is."

It is probable that none of us appreciate what a dim and shadowy realization most of us have of the existence of God; much more of his actual presence beside us.

It was said of a saintly brother in a certain church: "When he prays, I know he sees God."

It may be given to each of us to have a similar realization of God's immanence—that he is, and is the rewarder of them that diligently seek him.

There is a beautiful modern theory which tells us that the Christ in every man is shown in his good acts. If we have a kind and loving impulse, it is the Christ in us which gives it. If we thirst after righteousness; if we long and labor to correct the wrong; if we bear patiently persecution for principle; these indicate that Christ is present within us.

In one of the dark hours of ancient Scotland, the leader brought forth a golden urn, containing the embalmed heart of Robert the Bruce. The sight gave fresh courage to the discouraged army, and they went forth to conquest.

But we follow no dead leader. We are cheered by no past and gone hero. Our Christ walks beside us. His message is not only open before us in the pages of the Bible, but if we will only listen we may hear him speaking to our hearts. For he is very near unto every one of us.

Perhaps no man of our own time, gone from us only a little more than a decade, has seemed to possess more of the Christ in his heart than our beloved Phillips Brooks.

His doctrine, says one of his biographers, was: "Take God to be your Father, and Jesus Christ to be your Brother, and the Holy Spirit to be your Faithful Friend."

Thus, in every relation of life, he enjoined upon his hearers the practice of the presence of God.

There is no more steadying and uplifting conviction than that we are constantly in the sight of God, that our hand is in his, that he is closer than a brother and, as the poet has said, "nearer than hands and feet."

It was this vision of Immanuel, Christ with us, which nerved the martyr Stephen in his supreme trial, until, under the pain and indignity of his martyrdom, his face shone like the face of an angel.

Paul was imprisoned, whipped, stoned; "but," says Dr. Jefferson, "he never winces nor falters, but sings wherever he goes."

It was because God said to his soul, as he does to ours, "My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest."

A GOOD INCOME FOR YOU

SINCE the announcement by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that it had decided to share its prosperity with those of its readers who were willing to take up the light and agreeable task of canvassing for new subscribers we have received hundreds of responses and have made a large number of very satisfactory appointments.

Many of these agents, although working only a short time, are already reaping a rich harvest. Let us give you a few illustrations, showing how our Agency Proposition works out for the benefit of the canvasser:

Rev. Jewell Howard, Texas, drew in cash	$126 00
Mrs. P. E. Templeton, California, drew in cash	28 50
Mrs. M. W. Morrison, Virginia, drew in cash	195 00
Mrs. Joel Hough, South Carolina, drew in cash	34 50
Mrs. Mattie D. Tate, Tennessee, drew in cash	30 00
Mrs. Ervin Dieterly, Pennsylvania, drew in cash	27 00

These are only half a dozen chosen from the many hundreds of Agents now at work, who are extending the great Family Circle of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and at the same time netting a very substantial income for themselves. We guarantee that in every case a canvass by any reader of this paper will produce proportionately big results. This applies to rural localities as well as towns and cities. We equip you with all necessary material, free, including sample copies, subscription blanks, etc., and send you full instructions. You can utilize your spare hours to good financial advantage and do real missionary work besides. Before you have been at it two weeks you will be convinced that the business is a source of real revenue to you, and one which can be increased and relied upon every season. Many canvassers are adding enough to their income to pay their rent, or clothe their families, and to materially increase the comforts of living in many ways besides. You do not have to wait weeks and months for your remuneration; it comes in with every effort, and is not only ready money, but easy money. Try it and you will be pleasantly surprised at the result.

In addition to the large commission allowed on every subscription we give special State Prizes monthly to those who send in the largest list of new subscribers for the month, and also additional prizes for all who send over five subscriptions and who do not win the State Prize. Thus you will see that, with very little effort, you are sure of a multiplied result for your labor.

Let us send you our plan, and read it over thoroughly. No other publication in the world has ever profit-shared with its readers, as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is now doing. We expect to pay out many thousands of dollars on this profit-sharing plan this year.

A postal card to us will immediately bring you all necessary information, with full authority to act as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Subscription Agent in your neighborhood. Remember, there is no paper surer of a cordial welcome in the average home than THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which quickly becomes a permanent favorite. It is "the paper" for all Christian denominations, and should be in every home in America.

HIGH INCOME BONDS

Present conditions demand long time investments netting from 5 to 6 per cent. The developments of the last decade have demonstrated that well-chosen bonds of the classes represented below meet the requirements of most conservative investors. Correspondence is invited with Banks, Trustees, Insurance Companies, and private investors regarding these selected issues which have been bought for our own account and which we recommend unreservedly.

Carlton Consolidated Lumber Company

FIRST MORTGAGE 6's

The property back of this loan has an estimated cash value of five times the bond issue. Timber is located in the "fog belt" of Oregon 37 miles from Portland and is owned and controlled by the greatest banking interests on the Pacific Coast. Price on application.

The Hotel Sherman Company
CHICAGO
(Formerly The Sherman House)

First Mortgage 6% Serial Gold Bonds

A first mortgage on the new three million dollar Hotel Sherman. This hostelry has for years been the greatest earning hotel proposition, considering the investment, of all Chicago "loop" hotels. The cash investment of the new hotel is over three times the amount of this bond issue. Price on application.

Send for Circular No. 10,220 G.

We deal in all high-grade municipal, corporation and railroad bonds. If you hold securities netting you less than 4½% we would be pleased to consider with you the advisability of exchanging them for 5 and 6 per cent. securities from our carefully selected list. Our successful experience of over 30 years should be of considerable service to you.

HYDRO-ELECTRIC BONDS

A NUMBER of our readers have expressed a desire to learn something concerning hydro-electric plants and securities. For their information we submit the following:

The upbuilding of the West has been largely hastened through two systems of engineering development. What irrigation has done on the one hand to reclaim the desert portions of the West, as described in a previous article, so, on the other hand, has long distance transmission of electric power hastened the development of Western industries to a marked extent. In long-distance transmission plants the power of water is supplemented by the use of an electric current. Some of the changes wrought are seemingly little short of miraculous. Cities and towns, here, there and everywhere, are now being lighted, their streetcars are being operated and their factories run by electric currents which are generated in some cases as far as 200 miles away.

New Era in Development

One of the difficulties that formerly stood in the way of Western development was the lack of cheap coal. This was particularly the case in mountainous regions, where transportation is impossible during several months of the year. To illustrate, one mining town in the Rockies used to pack its coal in bags, which were carried up the trail on the backs of burros, at a cost in local transportation alone of $7 a ton. The way up the mountain was steep, and it is said that, in the course of years, the gulch below became dotted with the skeletons of burros which from time to time had staggered off the edge of the trail under their load. This instance, which shows the difficulties in the way of power-users in the West, was typical of many sections.

But finally along came the engineer, with the idea of harnessing the mountain waterfall and using its energy to operate dynamos, the current from which would be transmitted miles across country in any direction and utilized at the end of the line for operating electric motors.

The installation of the first of these systems was the beginning of a new era in certain phases of Western development. Communities which were far removed from the ordinary haunts of civilization suddenly found themselves able to enjoy luxuries of the light, heat and power order, which before then were obtainable only in large centres. The snows might make the hill trails impassable, the droughts might fall on the plain, but the mountain stream, way up among the peaks, could always be depended upon to urge the electric current upon its way toward business utility.

Wonderful Engineering Feats

The whole West and a large part of the East soon became criss-crossed with long-distance transmission lines. It was not uncommon for a succession of waterfalls to be harnessed and the accumulated power driven overland from a central station. Where the fall of itself was not great enough, companies were formed to build great dams, tapping watersheds and storing a vast quantity of water to manufacture pressure, which otherwise could not have been utilized. In some places water was gathered at various points in the mountain and piped for miles, often across deep canyons, on trestles, in aqueducts large enough in diameter to permit a horse and carriage to be driven through them. The South followed the example of the West, and numerous plants were installed. Niagara itself was harnessed, and the most beautiful waterfall in the world was made to manufacture power for neighboring factories.

The effect upon the various communities was well instanced in the growth of the city of Niagara Falls, which from being a mere watering place grew into a manufacturing city of no inconsiderable worth.

Advantages of Transmission Systems

This system for transmitting power had advantages other than those which had to do with the transportation of coal or with rendering inaccessible communities accessible. Once the transmission system was installed, it remained subject to very few of the untoward possibilities which sometimes beset other forms of power generation. National or local price movements could not affect a plant. Labor troubles were almost eliminated, because it required but a handful of men to operate a plant several miles long. The water flowed of its own accord, the dynamos turned from the water pressure, the electric current was transmitted through the wires, and could be rented out at the other end without any probability of interference from outside causes. There were few municipal considerations to be looked out for. A change in a municipal administration, for instance, could not affect the good management of a transmission plant as it might sometimes affect a gas plant.

It seemed an ideal system of power transmission, and so it has become, under certain circumstances, but it was inevitable that some of the projects would overshoot the mark. Some were over-capitalized, others reckoned upon a greater development than the community in which they operated could take care of. This has usually been typical of the history of new industries, but its effect upon the bond-buying public at the time was far from encouraging.

Buy Only the Bonds

Discouragements such as these attended the growth of a number of long-distance transmission systems, but as the communities in which they operated have grown more populous with the years these conditions have righted themselves. However, in considering hydro-electric securities possibilities like the above should not be lost sight of, particularly in the case of newly-projected plants.

We would advise our readers to consider only the bonds, and in doing so to make sure concerning the underlying mortgage—what convertible property is secured by it, what about the franchise, how long a period will it be in operation, what are the possibilities of the company in question remaining the only one in its particular field, and what are the possibilities and probabilities of the business that may be done. Hydro-electrics have some advantages over other industrials. The charge-off for wear and tear, etc., is estimated to average 2 per cent. on such plants, whereas the same charge-off for the average industrial is 6 per cent. In the matter of profit the hydro-electric also has the advantage of having no raw material to buy, to manufacture, or to deteriorate. Furthermore, the price of its product, electricity, delivered at the factory or local lighting and power station, may be determined (unless there is a clause in the franchise against it) by the market price of coal. The United States Statistical Bureau estimated that during the period from 1898 to 1903 the cost of bituminous coal rose 50 per cent. Very naturally such a rise in the price of coal would enhance the demand for long-distance transmission in a community where coal is ordinarily used.

Add to the above cautions those which apply to the buying of bonds in ordinary, and one should not go far wrong in considering hydro-electrics.

The Test of a Good Investment

EXPERIENCED business men judge the future by the past. That is their test. When a proposition offering all the essentials of a good investment is still further backed by a long record of "making good," it wins their approval.

IN continuing the offering of its 6% Gold Bonds to the public, the American Real Estate Company submits not only prospects, but facts;—not only hopes, but demonstrable proofs;—not only promises, but past performances.

FOR 22 years it has earned and paid 6% on its obligations to thousands of investors. During this period it has accumulated Assets of $15,536,199.47, and a Surplus of $1,751,154.38 in excess of its fixed charges, operating expenses and dividend distributions—very substantial proof of the profit-earning power of its business. The soundness of its plan and the merit of its Bond offering are established, time-tried, panic-proven. It offers to investors not a chance, but a certainty.

THE business behind the Bonds is the judicious buying and improvement of New York City real estate along the lines of the City's greatest growth—the mutual ownership of the best security on earth—a business of certain earning power that does not hazard the money invested.

THIS is a rational investment, fitted to the needs of the day. If you are interested in increasing the purchasing power of your money through a Just Interest Return, consistent with Absolute Safety, and guaranteeing you the additional feature of Cash Availability, write for particulars concerning our 6% Gold Bonds, issued in two forms:

6% COUPON BONDS
For those who wish to invest $100 or more. For Income Earning, paying interest semi-annually by coupons.

Prohibition Marching On

By Charles R. Jones, Chairman of the Prohibition National Committee

THE Congressional elections of 1910 will most vitally affect the future progress of the prohibition advance. If the next Congress does not have at least a few aggressive prohibitionists, and the dominance of liquor-controlled statesmanship is not broken, the result will be disastrous. For this reason we are concentrating all the influence and means of our national prohibition movement upon the election of well-known and able prohibition leaders to the next Federal House of Representatives.

No one can question the widespread progress of the temperance and prohibition movements. The persistent, unflinching agitation of the forty years since the Prohibition party was born, in 1869, is bearing fruit, and the question which was recently the butt of political ridicule is now the foremost issue in political, business and religious circles.

The revolution is not yet won, but we are in the midst of one of the grandest battles in all the annals of democracy. The first skirmishes of the conflict have been won, but the enemy—the well-organized liquor trust, supported by the forces of graft, vice and special privilege—is now thoroughly aroused and is preparing for desperate resistance. For this reason the peril of over-confidence lurks in the very shadow of our recent victories, just as in the 80's, when the liquor traffic turned back the tide of popular indignation by an alliance with the dominant parties and defeated prohibition in every State but North Dakota by the substitution of high license and "strict" regulation.

In the present emergency the combined forces standing for reform and civic righteousness must come to recognize the need of a political union to make permanent the gains already achieved and carry the campaign through to final and triumphant victory.

Recent events emphasize this need. Thirteen thousand saloons have closed their doors in the past two years, yet the liquor traffic, as shown by the official record of the Internal Revenue Department, after two years of encouraging decline in output and consumption, is growing by leaps and bounds. The explanation involves both the weak and cowardly officials of the Republican and Democratic parties, and the protection and sanction of the interstate liquor selling, still permitted by the Federal Government.

In other words, the liquor traffic has reorganized its channels of distribution. Through the aid of the United States mails, and the compulsory co-operation of railway and express service, they are ravaging every community and State from which liquor seller and maker have been supposedly outlawed.

So long as this continues it will be easy for the brewer and his allies to maintain thousands of joints and blind-tigers in prohibition territory. And this is the more successfully done because of the connivance of officials, who are the tools of political machines in sympathy and collusion with the traffic.

With forty million people living in no-saloon territory and with two-thirds of the area of the United States dry, including nine whole commonwealths, it is a most remarkable and extraordinary fact that there is not a single representative of either the Democratic or Republican parties in Congress who is known as an aggressive leader and champion of the rights of those living under prohibitory law. In fact, the single measure touching interstate liquor selling which was passed in Congress last year, and which went into effect January 1, has in no wise curtailed this traffic invasion of prohibition districts, but has, on the contrary, revealed the insincerity of the Republican leaders who brought about its adoption. The time has certainly come when the millions of voters who believe in prohibition should unite and organize politically to elect men to Congress who will honestly and stanchly represent their interests.

TEMPERANCE NOTES

—A LOCAL option petition in Chicago received 75,000 votes, only 61,000 being necessary. This is rightly considered a great victory for temperance and the anti-liquor forces are looking forward hopefully to the spring election.

—THREE-FIFTHS of the counties of the United States are now "dry." This is the result of fifteen years' work by the various temperance organizations. To-day there are 132 "dry" counties in Ohio and Indiana, 30 are "dry" in Michigan, and three-fourths of the counties of Washington, Oregon and Idaho are also "dry."

—THE Illinois State Food Department has announced its determination to stop the sale of all candies in the preparation of which alcohol has been used. Commissioner J. V. Newman, of Chicago, says that "many bonbons contain a medical intoxicant containing 32½ per cent. ether, 2½ per cent. ether oil and 65 per cent. alcohol. It causes not only drunkenness, but sickness. We found that many candy shells, filled with whisky, are sold to women and children."

Public Schools and the Saloon

Superintendent E. D. Fairchild, of the Kansas public schools, has lately been investigating attendance in the schools in different parts of that State. He reports that attendance is much more regular in interior towns than in towns on the Kansas border and near liquor States. "Of the half million boys and girls in Kansas," he writes, "only the smallest fraction has ever seen an open saloon. Children are growing to manhood and womanhood without the temptation of the saloon." This is something for which Kansans should be devoutly thankful.

The New Flavor

MAPLEINE

Better than Maple

Mapleine is a pure, wholesome and delicious flavoring extract, guaranteed under the Pure Food Laws of every State.

A few drops added to sugar dissolved in water makes a delicious table syrup, and used like lemon or vanilla it flavors pudding sauces, cake fillings, ice cream, ices, custards, candy, puddings, etc.

Your grocer sells it. If not, send us 35c. in stamps for a 2-oz. bottle and our cook book, "Mapleine Dainties."

Paulhan's Great Flight

ONE of the greatest fights in this age of the aeroplane was recently made at Jamaica, Long Island, N. Y., by the daring aviator, Louis Paulhan, who is fast winning for himself the first place among those who are striving for the mastery of the air. Paulhan came over from France a few months ago to give exhibitions and take part in several contests which were scheduled to take place in this country. The fame of his exploits had preceded him, and he was most cordially welcomed by the different aero clubs, each eager to have him make a flight on their own grounds. With him came his wife, a charming French woman, devoted to her husband and his interests in aerial navigation. She has often gone up as a passenger in her husband's airship, and has even tried to take a trip alone, one report has it.

Several thousand people went down from New York and Brooklyn to see Paulhan make his great flight. The wind, however, was blowing so hard that Paulhan did not think it would be possible to take his machine out. He finally went out to the field, and raised his hand to gauge the force and direction of the wind, and then ordered his biplane to be brought out.

He examined it and then took his seat in the frail craft. Evidently he did not wish to disappoint the spectators, even at the risk of breaking his own neck. The people realized the peril of a flight on such a day, and watched him with tense muscles as he prepared to shoot into the air. He spoke a word to an assistant and the propeller began to buzz as it cut circles in the atmosphere; then the machine rose, rocking in the gusts.

Paulhan's manager felt that it was a ride to certain death, and turned his back and would not look as the machine gathered force and began to go higher.

Paulhan fought his machine against the elements and won. It would rear and buck wildly, but he put on the full power of the motors and it would forge ahead into the very teeth of the gale. Time and again he showed his absolute mastery over his frail craft.

Then a breeze caught him, which seemed to head for the big barns at the outskirts of the field, and a wild cry arose from the crowds, "He has lost control!" but again he worked himself clear of danger and he headed in the direction of the little town of Valley Stream, and almost in less time than it takes to tell it he was hardly visible in the sky, a swiftly moving speck at the most. A few minutes later, he came riding back with the wind. He sailed in over the grand stand, while the spectators below craned their necks into all sorts of uncomfortable positions as they watched him cut figuro eights and other fancy designs in the air, with more ease than they could be done by an expert skater on the surface of a pond. He turned a crank or two, and the machine came gently to earth.

He had made his flight of six miles in eight minutes and ten seconds in a wind driving at the rate of twenty-five miles an hour. Part of the time he was shooting through space at seventy miles an hour. This is the fastest trip yet made with an aeroplane. The crowd surged about Paulhan, and found him as calm and collected as if he had just stepped off a trolley car. His wife, however, could not conceal her pride and pleasure at what her husband had done. And when the spectators went home they had forgotten that the day was bitter cold, but only remembered that they had seen something worth talking about for years to come, and worth listening to, which is much more.

The Christian's Sacrifice of Praise*

THE further the Christian advances in his religious experience the plainer does it become to him that the main purpose of prayer is not the mere obtaining of physical gifts from God.

One saintly man even went so far as to say recently, in a prayer meeting: "I am praying constantly less and less for earthly blessings. I am so deeply doubtful of the good they do me that I am coming more and more to say in my petitions: 'Thou knowest, O Lord, the desires of my heart. If best for the promotion of thy great plan, grant them. If not, give me calm resignation to thy will.'"

It is for the feeling of being in God's express presence, for the uplift that comes from nearness to him, and especially for the opportunity to thank him and praise him, that prayer, in the judgment of this godly man, was most to be valued.

It is well to praise God throughout life. It is even better to live so that when the great test-hour of death comes to us we can still praise.

One chief beauty of our wonderful religion is that it enables us, if we really possess it, to praise God to the end, even until the "voice is lost in death."

The mother of the Wesleys said, with almost her last breath: "Children, I am going. Sing a song of praise."

The sainted Dr. Cookman shouted, as he expired: "Hallelujah! I am sweeping through the gates."

Edward Perronet, the author of "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name," cried when dying: "Glory to God! Into his hands I commend my spirit."

George Matheson, that most poetic and spiritual of preachers, reminds us, in one of his exquisite sermons, of an oft neglected duty in prayer. He says: "Our habitual cry is, 'Provide for our human wants, O Lord!' I do not mean that we are purely selfish; we often pray for the satisfaction of needs not individually our own. But it rarely strikes us that these needs are shared by the Divine. We forget that God, too, has a want—the craving of an infinite love. We forget that it is God who says to man, and not man who says to God, 'Behold, I stand at the door and knock.'

"Lord, in my prayers let me remember thee. I have heard the children's cry for bread, but not the Father's cry for fellowship.

"I have begun to learn that what I call humanitarian sympathy stretches down to the beast of the field, but it has hardly dawned on me that it should also stretch up to heaven.

"Send me the dawn of thy light, O Lord! Help me to frame golden wishes for thee! Make me jubilant in thy joy, transported in thy triumph, proud when thou art praised!"

This is a point in prayer which we may all well remember. There is no moment in our lives which is not rich in blessing. A sudden catastrophe—a sharp personal sorrow, an unaccountable turn of fortune's wheel—such a thing may for a while shut from thy sight the great glory; but search and thou shalt find abundant cause for praise. Forget thyself:

Help thy fellow-men
And send the day into the darkened heart.
Nor list for guerdon in the voice of men;
And more—think well! Do—well will follow thought;
And lay thine uphill shoulder to the wheel.
And past the range of Night and Shadow—see
The high heaven-dawn of more than mortal day
Strike on the Mount of Vision.

Thus shalt thou forever "praise God, from whom all blessings flow."

Keep Your Eye on Montana

This great "Treasure State" has as its chief treasure, some of the finest irrigated valleys and dry farming lands in the West.

The Yellowstone Valley and its tributaries, the Tongue, Rosebud, Bighorn, Clark's Fork, Shields Rivers and Big Timber Creek, have thousands of acres of irrigated land for sale at low prices. Huntley and Lower Yellowstone Government Reclamation projects, and numerous private projects, will reclaim more than 100,000 acres in this region. The Shields River Line of the Northern Pacific just completed opens up a rich section, particularly attractive.

¶ The Northern Pacific extends into or through Minnesota, Wisconsin, North Dakota, Montana, Idaho, Washington, Oregon. New rich territory being opened up by extensions now building. The Homeseeker's Chance!

The Gallatin Valley, the "granary" of Montana, with the adjacent Madison and Jefferson Valleys, form a great grain producing area from which Europe derives food.

The Bitter Root and the Clark's Fork Valleys are noted for their luscious fruit and the fertile Flathead country is a garden spot.

Don't delay too long—write tonight for information about the great "Treasure State," and the very low one-way fares effective March 1st to April 15th, with stop-over privilege

THE TRIBUTE OF THE POETS

THE NOBLER PART

O H, great, true-hearted leader,
Oh, soul of love and zeal,
Oh, mighty force to help along
The cause of human weal;
Thy life an inspiration
To many and many a heart,
Bidding it rise from selfish ease
And bear a noble part.

Whene'er did flood or famine
At home or far abroad
Not fall upon thy listening ear
Like the very voice of God?
Then, how the mightiest forces
Were marshaled to thine aid,
Till human hearts were gladdened
And want and woe were stayed!

Those men upon the Bowery—
Though home or Old-World race—
Who loved to clasp thine outstretched hand,
Or greet thy smiling face.
How long will they remember
Their strong and steadfast friend,
Who welcomed them in Jesus' name
And loved them to the end?

Oh, how Mont-Lawn will miss thee!
Those children of thy love.
And still thy hand shall beckon
Those lambs to folds above.
Oh, may thy deeds enthuse us
To follow in thy lead—
To gather in the homeless
And help them in their need!

Oh, joy to thee, dear brother!
Thy life-work, well begun,
Shall broaden in the coming years
With every rising sun.
"Abundant entrance" greeted thee
To realms of higher bliss,
And "welcome" rang through that bright world
Ere farewells hushed in this.

—MRS. MARY B. WINGATE.

Pittsfield, Me.

HIS "WORKS DO FOLLOW"

(To the Memory of Dr. Louis Klopsch)

SAY not his work is done,
That cannot be;
But rather say his work is but begun,
And ne'er will cease through all eternity.

The voice, alas! is stilled,
The hands at rest;
The busy brain no more with care is filled,
The kind heart throbs no longer in his breast.

But yet he liveth on,
And evermore
His influence will abide, his aims be won,
And reach fruition on another shore.

That which is good doth last,
Good cannot die;
And 'mong the great deeds of the glorious past
The good which he hath wrought shall ever lie.

His noble life will tell,
From sea to sea,
Like sweetest music, and, like ocean, swell;
And richer for that life our world shall be.

—JENNIE WILSON-HOWELL.

Workers at Home and Abroad

—EVANGELIST EVAN ROBERTS, the Welsh revivalist, was prostrated by his last evangelistic campaign four years ago, and has been practically incapacitated for work ever since.

—THE ADDRESS of the Cremorne Mission is 108 West Thirty-first Street, New York City. A recent article, describing the work of the mission, appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

—MESSRS. TULLAR and Meredith, the well-known evangelists, singers and composers of sacred music, have been conducting a revival in East Orange, N. J., of which place Mr. Tullar is a resident.

—THE TWENTIETH anniversary of the Chicago Tract Society was celebrated recently. During the two decades, nearly eighty missionaries have served the association. Twenty-five are now in service.

—EVANGELISTS OSCAR LOWRY and George Moody have been conducting a four weeks' successful revival in Anaconda, Mont. More than 700 confessed Christ. Revs. L. P. Schooling, J. W. Bennett, H. A. Carnahan, G. C. Strom, M. H. H. Lee and D. M. Hand, all local pastors, have been co-operating heartily in the movement.

—EVANGELIST H. W. BROMLEY, of Wilmore, Ky., writes: "We have just closed a great union tabernacle meeting at Beresford, S. D. Over six hundred came forward during the twenty-six days of the campaign. The work took great hold upon the men, about half of the professions being men. We give God the glory."

—REV. T. H. EVANS, of Horton, Ia., writes: "We have just closed a very successful evangelistic campaign, which began December 10 last. Many have been saved, and backsliders have been reclaimed. Evangelist Chester I. Orr, of Portland, Me., had charge of the work, and Sister Miles, of Tripoli, Ia., organized a large choir, which did excellent service.

—MISSIONARY W. M. BREWSTER, of Hinghua, China, writes that they have experienced a modern Pentecost in South China lately. The population is dense, averaging 4,000 to the square mile. The workers have gone from place to place, holding meetings in tents, with large audiences. Trained helpers are greatly needed, also medical workers, and a supply of tents for the evangelistic work. Mr. Brewster appeals for contributions.

There Is Only One "Automatic" It Is Made In Bloomington, Illinois

There is absolutely no question as to the efficiency of vacuum cleaning—that has been thoroughly tested in homes all over this country and thousands of women have been emancipated from the drudgery of housecleaning. The problem, then, for you to settle is, not "shall I adopt vacuum cleaning", but "which really is the best vacuum cleaner."

Probably you are one of the great majority of American housewives who are not favored with homes wired for electric lighting. You have seen advertisements of electric vacuum cleaners and have wished your home was equipped so as to use one of them. You have also seen the advertisements of hand-power vacuum cleaners from $5.00 up, which were no more or less than toys and the result was bewildering.

We want to tell you about a Hand Power Vacuum Cleaner—a real Vacuum Cleaner—that sucks up all the dust and dirt from the carpets, rugs, furniture, curtains, portieres—and does it as perfectly as any of the big electric Vacuum Cleaners. You don't have to take up the rugs, or carpets, or remove a single article of furniture when you use the

AUTOMATIC
Vacuum Cleaner
"It Gets ALL The Dirt"

and dust out of everything to which you touch it. It sucks the dirt off the floor right through the carpet and thoroughly cleans mattresses, pillows, upholstered furniture, portieres, etc.—and it does all this with less effort than it takes to push a carpet sweeper—in but a quarter of the time—a tenth of the labor and does the work indescribably better. It can be operated with ease by a small child, but even that assistance is not really necessary—one person can readily operate it—and it is so light in weight that it can be easily carried about. This is the only real "Automatic" on the market. It practically works by itself, screening 95 per cent of the dirt it gathers up.

It is built to last a life-time—iron and steel throughout and so simple that there is nothing to get out of order. It is the only Vacuum Cleaner made containing no tin or wood. You need strong suction for thorough cleaning. The "Automatic" has the strongest pump, therefore the greatest suction. It is equipped with slip joints on hose, nickle plated handle and special tools for cleaning curtains, portieres, pictures, books, base-boards and moldings without disturbing anything.

The "Automatic" is the only Hand Power Vacuum Cleaner that blows as well as sucks. With it you can clean out the crevices, in corners, behind and underneath radiators and in all sorts of places where it would be utterly impossible to work with a broom. It is very convenient for airing the bedding, pillows, mattresses, etc., or drying the hair.

For the Home, Office or Other Building Equipped With Electricity

The Automatic Triumph Electric Vacuum Cleaner solves the problem of rapid housecleaning. It reduces the work of cleaning from hours to minutes. It is made with as much care and precision and of as high grade material as the most expensive watch.

The motor is the best and most expensive ever used in any vacuum cleaner. The rotary pump gives a continuous, powerful suction which cleans thoroughly. The dust separator is very simple and can be emptied without the slightest inconvenience. The machinery is all enclosed in a highly polished metal case and does not in any way come in contact with the dust. It is utterly impossible for the Automatic Triumph Electric to inflict any kind of injury to person or clothing. It has been carefully tested by the New York Board of Fire Underwriters, and is admitted to any building without, in any way, increasing the insurance hazard. The Automatic Triumph Electric represents the highest example of perfection in Vacuum Cleaner construction. If you are equipped with electricity, it will be well worth your while to write for our new booklet describing the Automatic Triumph Electric Vacuum Cleaner.

We make strong claims for the Automatic Vacuum Cleoner. We know that it is made better and will give better satisfaction than any other hand-power Vacuum Cleaner on the market—because of our complete and up-to-date equipment for manufacturing the Automatic Vacuum Cleaner in large quantities, we are able to place it within the reach of everyone—at the remarkably low price of $25. We say that it will satisfy you, but we don't ask you to accept our statement as final proof that the "Automatic" is the only vacuum cleaner for you to buy—we don't ask you to buy until it has proven its superiority.

—Our Ten Day Free Trial Plan Will Prove Our Claims To You

There is only one way to get this proof—test the "Automatic" in your own home for ten days. Clean your carpets, rugs, curtains, furniture, bedding with it and satisfy yourself that all we say about the "Automatic" is true.

We want every housewife who reads this advertisement to prove to her own satisfaction that she can be emancipated from the drudgery of housecleaning. Use it ten days, and if at the end of that time you are not thoroughly satisfied that the "Automatic" is the very best Vacuum Cleaner made, return it to us at our expense.

You cannot afford to turn down this opportunity to test out the only real, practical, low priced Vacuum Cleaner sold today, requiring neither motor nor electricity. Fill out the coupon below and mail it to us today and get the full particulars regarding our ten day free trial proposition and with it our handsomely illustrated booklet fully describing the Automotic Vacuum Cleaner.

We Want Live Representatives Everywhere

We are satisfied that we have the most efficient Vacuum Cleaner—either hand or electric power—on the market today. We have spared neither time nor money in perfecting it, and we have placed it at a price within the reach of all. You will find the Automotic Vacuum Cleaner a quick and profitable seller. Write to us today regarding agents' proposition. Means big things for you.

Questions and Answers

In forwarding MSS. to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, enclose stamped envelopes for return, if unavailable.

R. M., Manomet, Mass. 1. Please explain Matt. 5:3. What is "poor in spirit"? 2. Also Matt. 5:13. How can salt lose its savor? 3. Were Christ's disciples converted when he called them to make them fishers of men?

1. The poor in spirit are the humble, those who have the inward conviction of their own weakness and unworthiness. 2. Salt is not always salt. Chemists assure us that it can lose its savor by exposure and become worthless. The disciples were unquestionably a body of earnest, moral men. They were simple, and zealous for truth and righteousness. Jesus knew their hearts, and when he called them they "believed on him." The fact that they loved him and left all and followed him in His ministry throughout Galilee proved their faith in the Master and their devotion to his service.

C. M. McC., Renney, W. Va. In a late issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD you spoke of finding the bones of human beings buried in a valley in Peru, which were supposed to have been lying there for seven thousand years. If all mankind sprang from Adam, and it has been about six thousand years since the Creation, how do you reconcile this with the statement that these people could have been buried seven thousand years?

Science here does not conflict with the Scriptures. The Bible nowhere asserts that the world is six thousand years old. In the first chapter of Genesis it simply says, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." Recorded history, however, does not run back beyond six thousand years. The chronology in the margin of the Bible is not a part of the Book itself, but was compiled by Archbishop Ussher about 250 years ago, and has been used ever since as a basis for subsequent calculations.

W. G. M., Charleston, W. Va. Tell me the surname of the German Kaiser. I know he was the eldest son of Queen Victoria's eldest daughter, but I do not know his father's or grandfather's family name on the other side.

Properly speaking, the German Emperor, like most rulers descended from ancient ruling houses, has no surname. He belongs to the house of Hohenzollern, which dates back of the time when surnames had come into use. Hohenzollern is the name of a small countship, or principality. The rulers and nobles in the early Middle Ages used their given name, followed by that of the district over which they ruled; as, for example, William of Hohenzollern. If they obtained a larger domain, they would continue this use of their given name, but use the name of the new principality after it. So one royal line may have had several titles or designations. Later ruling houses which were ennobled or attained royal power since the Middle Ages have a surname, as their subjects. Napoleon's family name, for instance, was Bonaparte. Queen Victoria also was known as a member of a certain royal house, but she could not be said to have a surname in the same way that a person is known as Smith or Jones.

W. G. H., Medina, O. How is radium obtained? Is it a mineral, or is it manufactured?

Radium is an element discovered by Madame Curie, of France, in 1902. It is probable that it is widely distributed, in very minute quantities, but its principal source is pitchblende, which comes from Joachimsthal, in North Bohemia. Only a few grains are found to the ton there, and it is a tedious process to separate it from the pitchblende.

Mrs. G. K., Westfield, Ind. In Matt. 20:16 what is meant by the passage, "Many are called but few are chosen"? Does "chosen" mean "elected"?

It means that many receive the invitation of the Gospel, yet are not chosen to salvation through the sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth. Thus there are many who work in Christ's service, yet who never were chosen workers in the spiritual sense of the term. See Matt. 22:14 for an illustration. The guest was invited, but had not on the distinctive garment. See also the same thought in Matt. 7:21-23, showing that not the mere outward form of religion, but the transformation of the heart, is necessary to acceptance.

Our Extraordinary Book Offer

"Not Many, But Good Books"

IN LAYING before the members of the Great CHRISTIAN HERALD Family this Exceptional Offer in Books, we feel we are giving a long-sought opportunity for them to enlarge their libraries at a nominal expense.

Surely nothing can have a better or more lasting effect on every member of the household than a bright, clear, educational volume, and no more suitable or welcome gift can be imagined than that which constantly reminds the friend of the thoughtfulness of the giver.

There are but a limited number of these volumes, and owing to the strain put on our presses by our large issues, it will be impossible for us to print another edition of even one of these books. Therefore we would advise you to make a second choice, so that we can surely supply you to your entire satisfaction.

We, of course, pay all charges.

Korean Coolies Carrying the Gospels for Distribution

A VISIT TO THE ORIENT

By J. WILBUR CHAPMAN

WITH Mr. Charles M. Alexander, my associate in evangelistic work, I spent the months of August, September, October, and a part of November, 1909, in China, Korea and Japan. If one were "upon pleasure bent," there is no journey quite equal to this in all the world.

The wonderful harbor of Hong Kong; the crowded streets of Canton; the interesting Bund in Shanghai; the journey up the Yangtze-Kiang, which at times equals the Hudson in beauty; the strange experiences in Peking, with its walled cities for the Chinese and its protected legations for the Europeans, all inspire and thrill you.

The visit to Korea, where the inhabitants present the most pathetic picture to be found in modern history; Japan, its foliage, its inland sea, its beautiful rivers, the splendor of Nikko and the fascination of the Japanese people themselves, all these things would charm the ordinary traveler, and if he makes the journey once he would be eager to go again.

To one interested in the study of nations there is no trip like one through the Orient.

China is waking as from a deep sleep, and she is to-day shaking herself as she recovers from her slumber of ages and is making ready to take her place among the foremost nations of the world. Korea is in the process of transformation. Her people are to-day oppressed and tried almost beyond endurance, and yet out of the crucible of fire they are coming in strength, and whether they are annexed to Japan or not, the country will always be thrillingly interesting.

The eyes of the world are upon Japan. She is a military force to reckon with, and the little brown man of the Orient is a powerful individual; while with his uniform off he is the most charming and courteous of gentlemen to be found in the world.

But we were not traveling for the delights of travel, nor going with wide open eyes to study the nations as such, but we were preaching the Gospel and although our message in sermon and song was through interpreters, it was received everywhere with sympathy and enthusiasm, and the results were as great as when speaking to the Australians or the Europeans.

Three notable services were given, viz.: in the Martyrs' Memorial Hall, in connection with the Y. M. C. A., in a hall erected and dedicated to the memory of the martyrs who suffered during the Boxer uprising. Mr. Alexander and I conducted a service for men only. Most of the faces were those of Chinese students, many of them from homes of culture and wealth, others from the homes of government officials. The coolies are coming to Christ, but so are the students. I spoke on the Judgment, a sermon I have often delivered to American men, and I saw at least seventy-five men come to the front and profess faith in Christ. One of them was the son of a government official.

A Gospel Mass Meeting of Koreans in Seoul, During the Great Revival

What we saw in Shanghai we also experienced in other cities. China is ripe for an awakening.

In Seoul, the meetings were held in the Y. M. C. A. building, which is the munificent gift of our own Honorable John Wanamaker to the young men of the capital of Korea. Mr. Wanamaker is an honored official in my old church in Philadelphia, and I looked upon this building with keen delight, because it was the expression of his devotion to his Master. This great hall, seating at least 1,000 people, was thronged whenever the doors were opened. Sometimes women only, again men only. Once or twice young people only, but whatever the class preached and appealed to, the results were the same. They are not an emotional people, but many of them sobbed their way into the kingdom of God.

The missionaries of Korea came in to attend the conferences Mr. Alexander and I were conducting. I think they are the greatest missionaries in the world. They are loyal to Christ and to the word of God. They have a passion for souls. Their battle cry this year is "A million souls for Christ in a year," and from all parts of the continent they are hearing the good news that men and women by the hundred are pressing their way into the kingdom of heaven.

The Japanese people are easy to speak to. They are intelligent, keen, quick to understand what you are talking about, notwithstanding the fact that you speak through an interpreter. In Japan we beheld the same marvelous results after the sermon had been preached and the songs had been sung.

This Japanese meeting in Kioto was in the City Hall. Men only were on the lower floor, and they were literally sitting on the floor. The women were in the gallery. Some of the missionaries surrounded Mr. Alexander and myself upon the platform. On one night sixty men accepted Christ.

I believe the Orient is ready for a well-planned evangelistic campaign. I believe a hundred men on fire with a passion for souls, laboring in hearty co-operation with the missionaries, could make a profound impression upon these great countries. As for the missionaries themselves, they are a superb class of people, cultured and consecrated; in their medical work showing a skill that would make them famous at home, and in their more directly spiritual work showing the same spirit that animated the martyrs of old. My heart is thrilled with the memory of the journey. I would think it the highest privilege of my life to go back again and labor with the missionaries or under the direction of the boards of the church. There is no investment of money to-day which can count for quite so much as that which is given to the work in the Orient.

A SERMON BY

Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D.*

TAKING CHRIST BY FAITH

TEXT—John 3:3

MY subject is found in the Scripture which is recorded in the third chapter of St. John's Gospel, third verse: "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God."

I suppose there is no chapter in all the Bible with which we feel we are more familiar than this third chapter of St. John. I have an idea that this is because we find in it the marvelous sixteenth verse. Luther said it was the Gospel in a nutshell. Another distinguished preacher has said: "If you should take away from man all of the Old Testament and all of the New Testament, and simply leave him this text: 'For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life,' he would know enough of the heart of God, and he would know enough of the plan of salvation, to be saved." Yet to my mind there is no chapter in all the Bible so difficult of explanation.

What Regeneration Means

It is in this chapter that we have the thought of regeneration presented, and if I should say to you, "Give me a definition of regeneration," I question if any one of you could give a definition that would be satisfactory or plain to the man or woman who is seeking Jesus Christ. On the other hand, if you should say to me, "Give me an illustration of regeneration," I could do it easily. I could tell you the story of the man who came into this building last night bound with sin, and who all this day has been free. That is regeneration. I could tell you the story of the woman who at the beginning of this mission was hopeless and helpless, and who to-day is giving her testimony to the marvelous saving and keeping power of Jesus Christ.

I would ask you to listen to her friends, who say that she is a changed woman; changed in her expression, changed in her manner of speech, changed so that she has become a new creature. That is regeneration. You will notice that this text has a marginal reading, which says, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, except a man be born from above." So when you say you have resolved to give up sin, that is not enough. When you tell me that you have resolved never again to go into the way of iniquity, that is not enough, even if you could keep the resolution. If a man is to become a new creature, and overcome the power of old sin and new temptation, he must be born from above, and that means to have implanted in his nature a new force from above. It is to have within himself a new life, which is the life of God. It is to have a Saviour offered to and accepted by him. That is regeneration.

The Message of Forgiveness

Major Whittle once said, in my old church in Philadelphia, that when Jesus was here he filed a bill of exceptions. One count of that bill you find in Matt. 18:3: "Verily I say unto you, except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." There are people to-day who say that there is a distinction to be made between conversion and regeneration; they say that conversion is your part of the work and regeneration is God's part. Conversion is your putting yourself in the way. Regeneration is God's doing the work in you. Conversion is saying, "I will." Regeneration is God's breathing into you the breath of his own life. The second count in the bill is recorded in Matt. 5:20: "Except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven." So there is very little hope for the person who puts away the Saviour, either to see God or to know him. Indeed, there is no hope, and there is no open door. No man would dare to say that by his own efforts he could reach a standard of righteousness that would pass the judgment of an infinite God. Then how are you going to be saved? I know how you may be saved, and I tell it to the man who up to this moment is hopeless, and to the woman who has been helpless. I tell it to the rich and to the poor. I convey the message to the outcast: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." For by faith we are united to Christ, and his righteousness becomes our righteousness. That is the only way to be saved.

The third of the counts in the bill we find in the Gospel of St. Luke 13:3: "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." What is repentance? There are people who say that repentance is sorrow for sin. Then everybody repents, for there is not a man bound with a passion, not a woman held with a sin, that has not had a sorrow for sin. They have said, with hearts almost breaking, "Oh that we might be free!" That is not repentance. There are people who say that remorse is repentance. Then all the sinful people in the city have repented, because day after day, walking the streets, and night after night, tossing restlessly upon their beds, they have said, "My God, my sin! my sin!" They are in this building, and they would cut off their right hands if they could be free from their sin. But that is not repentance. It is a sense of sorrow for sin, it is the crushing effect of remorse on account of sin; but it is also saying, "With God's help, I will turn away from sin." It is turning right-about-face and looking unto him. Then the other count in the bill is the text of this evening: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." I hear somebody say, "I cannot come to Jesus." Why? You say you have no feeling. But you never will have until you come. And another person says, "I cannot come to Jesus." Why? And you answer, "Because the doctrine of the atonement seems to me to be so impossible. I cannot understand how Jesus Christ, dying upon Calvary 1900 years ago and more, can ever set me free."

Taking the Step by Faith

A man said in my presence that, if he could explain the atonement, he would become a Christian. Then he will never come to Jesus, for not until we see God can we begin to understand the atonement. Not an angel in heaven understands it. Eternity will not be long enough in which to comprehend it. And if you are waiting for this, you are like the man in the university, who said: "I will never study astronomy until I can understand it; I will never enter a class of mathematics until I can solve every problem." You must come by faith. Here is another man who says he cannot come. Why? And taking up the Bible, he turns over its pages and says, "Too many contradictions." I dare to say this evening that there has never been a book in the world that has harmony in it like this old Book has, from Genesis to Revelation. No, men and women, if you stand back to argue, then you will never come.

A man once came to Mr. Moody and said, "If you will answer this list of questions, then I will become a Christian." But Mr. Moody was too clever for him. He said, "If you will become a Christian, and start to-night, and then come to me to-morrow morning, then I will answer every question in your list." The man said, "Sir, I will come." That night he accepted Christ as his Saviour. The next morning he came back to Mr. Moody's house, his face shining, and said, "Mr. Moody, I will not have to put you to the trouble of answering the questions; they have all been answered." That is the way to come. If men, the latchet of whose shoes you are not worthy to unloose; if women, in whom you have as perfect confidence as you have in your mother; if men like Gladstone, if men like our President McKinley, if men like General Booth, and if women like Catherine Booth can say, "We took the step by faith, and all the way became bright ahead of us," then I think we can trust the Saviour. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." It is God's Word, and you must yield.

Being "Born Again"

But I turn to the Scripture and find that the story makes it very plain. This is what Jesus said: "Nicodemus, you must be born again." I can imagine some people saying, "I can quite understand how one deep in sin should be born again. I can appreciate the fact that a drunkard must be born again." But Nicodemus was a moral man, yet Jesus said to him, "Ye must be born again." Then if Nicodemus must, so must you. Jesus made it very plain. He said, "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." Then he said, "Except a man be born of water . . ." I think sometimes we make all too little of baptism. Of course, when I stand here I do not proclaim the mode of baptism, but I announce my belief in the rite of baptism.

And as I turn over the pages of the Scriptures I find that again and again baptism is plainly presented to us as a duty. But Jesus, I am sure, was not talking about water baptism here. He said, "Except a man be born of water," and he was talking to a Jew. If you turn back to the Old Testament, you will see that the references to water are references to the Word. So this is what Jesus surely meant, "Except a man be born of the Word." What does that mean? It means that you can take God's promise, and you can hold it in your mind

A Definite Invitation

You can keep it in your memory, and hold it there by faith, and God will keep his word. That is the way to be saved. We have in our country a distinguished Methodist preacher, who rose in a conference one day and said, in my hearing: "I was raised in a Methodist family. Every member of the household was a perfect battery of emotion. We never had a Methodist revival that they did not drag me to the altar, and hold me there, but I would not be saved. But one morning, when a student, I was seated on the campus at college preparing for my Bible lesson when I came to John 3:16, 'For God so loved the world . . .' I stopped and said, 'That is big enough for me.' 'That he gave his only Son . . .' That is provision enough for me. 'That whosoever believeth on him . . .' That is definite enough for me. 'Should not perish.'

"I arose from my sitting position and, taking my little Testament in my hand, I held it up and said, 'O God, here this morning I accept this statement of thine as the truth. I will hold on to it while I live. I will carry it with me to the judgment, and if I am not saved it will go hard with your book.' And suddenly I found my eyes filled with tears, I found my lips trembling, I found my heart burning, and from that day to this I have been a battery of emotion myself." That is the way to be saved. Just hold on God's Word, and it will do its own work. But Jesus makes it plainer. He says, "born of water (that is the word); born of the Spirit." That is your minister's preaching; that is the singing; that is your mother's pleading. It is the tear-stained request that I held in my hand a moment ago, signed by a broken-hearted mother. It is everything that can make you think. It is everything that can make you want to turn. It is the Spirit of God pleading.

Led to Christ by a Child

One evening at a service in New York City I saw a very distinguished looking man rise and say, "I will accept Christ." I went back to the hotel, and told my wife that I believed I had been used of Christ to lead a great man to God. I thought I had, but the next day, which was a day of prayer, I saw this man come into the service carrying in his arms a little lame boy. He brought him forward and, placing him on the platform, he came over to me, and, placing his hand up to his mouth so that the child could not hear him, he said, "I want to introduce to you my little Joe; he is going to die." I did not need to tell me that. The little fellow's face was so white and his hands were so thin. When he came over he said, with all the pride of a father, "This is Joe; he led me to Christ." I confess I was a bit disappointed. Then he told me the story. He said: "When the mission started, Joe said to me, 'Father, I cannot go, but mother will take you; and all the time you are gone I will pray.' I never came into the house at night that I did not hear the tap of his little crutch on the floor as he came to welcome me the moment the door was opened. He would spring into my arms and say, 'Did you come?' The last night he did not ask me. I heard him coming to the door, and as it was opened he sprang into my arms and buried his face on my shoulder, and I heard him say, with a sob, 'You have come, you have come; I know you have.'" That is the Spirit working. It is every holy influence. It is every prayer of your mother; it is every cry of the preacher; it is every sob of your wife by your side, when she sees

"rn ye, turn ye, for why will ye d?" Born of water and of the Srit.

May I say in conclusion that we ce into the kingdom of God with diffent experiences. Some men sob tir way to Christ. Other men shout tir way into the kingdom. Some m come with all the calmness that is pt of their nature. I like the story o the gentleman in Philadelphia who, a er hearing his minister preach, t ned to the man near him and said, "r, when do the officers of this church n t?" And the man said, "They will n t now, if you wish it." And the g tleman said, "Call them together." V en the officers of the church came t ether, this gentleman, who was one o the greatest manufacturers in A erica, stood before them and said, "ntlemen, for a long time I have beli ed in Jesus Christ, but I have never a nowledged him. To-day, when the m ister preached, I thought the time h come, and before you this morning I knowledge Jesus Christ as my Sav r." One of the officers rose, and m ved that he be received into the church. Another seconded it. And tlt gentleman walked out of the room a hristian, and kept on walking with Crist to the day of his death, a model Cristian. I do not care how you c e. You may come from the East; y may come from the West; you may c e from the South; you may ap ach from the North.

But come; waiting will not save you. Weping will not save you. Working w not save you. Come! The dang is this: you are very near the kgdom—so very near. An uplifted h d, and the will to rise to your feet, a your resolution not to yield would g n a flash. I once said to an Americh preacher in Oregon, "How did you c e to Christ?" and he said, "I was r sed in a Christian home; my mother w s a saint; my father a church officer a a priest of God. I was very near tl kingdom, but I did not yield. One n ht I heard the minister use this il stration, and it won me. He said: 'V from the New England country m not forget that dreadful white pgue which we call in America tuberc sis. A gentleman who was sufferi from this disease started out for th mountains, and as is usual in our c ntry with people suffering with this c plaint who go to the mountains his fi t days were days of real suffering. H became very discouraged, and said, "will die if I stay here," and started h e. He sent a telegram to his home inthe country, saying that he would a ive by such and such a train. But a storm came on. The telegraph wires w e down, and the train was delayed. H home was three miles from the c ntry station. He reached the stati at midnight. No one knew of his c ing, as the telegram was never deli ered. The station was closed, and t lights were out. His house was t nearest. There was only one thing f him to do. He must fight his way t ough the storm. Dying though he w s, he pushed his way through the e r-increasing snowdrifts, until at l t he saw a light in the window of his h e. He passed through the gate, a staggered up the walk. Just as he r ched the step of the door he fell u on his knees from faintness, and w h his hand upon the step of the door h died.'" My friend told me that the minister turned to his congregation a l said, "There is some young man in t s building with his hand upon the s o of the door. Some day the door w l shut." And my friend said, "I r e from my pew, and walked home to n father, and dropping on my knees b his side, I said, 'I will yield, I will y ld.'"

Almost is but to fail,
Almost cannot avail,
Sad, sad, that bitter wail,
Almost, but—lost!

A GOLDEN SPOON

By Rev. J. M. FARRAR, D.D.*

HE loved God and little children. One day he heard of a poor child who had diphtheria. The little one was near death. It would not take medicine. He was soon by the bedside. "I will give you a gold spoon, if you will take the medicine." The child asked with tongue and eyes: "A real gold spoon, and all my own?" Out he rushed, and soon returned with a beautiful gold spoon. Into his arms he lifted the child, and the taste of the medicine was lost in the sight of the golden spoon. You want to know the man's name. I want to write his name—Louis Klopsch—on your heart.

THE chapter in which you find the text, "One spoon of gold," tells of the offerings the princes made to God when the temple was dedicated. "Nethaneel, the son of Zuar, prince of Issachar, did offer." Then follows the long list of his princely gifts, and among them is "One spoon of gold." In God's memory book I imagine this record: "Louis Klopsch, the son of Dr. Osmar Klopsch, prince of Christians, did offer." In the long list of his offerings I am sure will be found "one spoon of gold." The sick-room of the little child was a temple, the golden spoon was an altar, and the medicine was a sweet incense before God.

IN the winter of 1892-93 there were 100,000 people idle in the city of New York. Dr. Klopsch, who, as a Sunday School teacher, had been visiting the poor and giving them one-tenth of his income, now started a relief fund. During the winter he furnished 1,200 families with food. It was at this time he found the little child dying with diphtheria and saved its life with the golden spoon. His next thought was to establish a summer home, where children could find the health and happiness God wanted them to enjoy. The result of his heart-effort is Mont-Lawn. The golden-spoon child was one of the first to be taken to the home. So useful was she in making the home bright and cheerful that Dr. Klopsch kept her as a little helper during the entire summer.

Some one might have said, "Why was not this golden spoon sold and the money given to the poor?" It was the extravagance of love, and wherever the history of Mont-Lawn is told this story of the golden spoon should be heard. The golden spoon is now the sixty-thousand-dollar Mont-Lawn, where three thousand children every summer are made strong enough to resist disease. Since Mont-Lawn was opened 40,000 children have found health, happiness and heaven.

LAST summer I left the train at Nyack and drove up the mountain side with Dr. Klopsch. The beautiful country of mountains and valleys, meadows and harvest fields slowly unfolded before us. At a turn in the road Mont-Lawn, like heaven let down to earth, was before us. As we drove through the great stone archway, over which is inscribed in letters of gold, "I Love God and Little Children," there was a surprise I shall never forget. The children, crowding upon the terrace to greet Dr. Klopsch, sang out:

Mont-Lawn, Mont-Lawn, here we are!
Mont-Lawn, Mont-Lawn, 'Rah, 'Rah, 'Rah!

I did not see Dr. Klopsch again until noon, the children claimed him. During his absence I visited the cottage dormitories, with their snow-white beds; the Homestead, with its offices and resting-rooms; the playgrounds, shaded by great trees, beautified by flowers and fountains, and cut by walks made more beautiful by footprints of children. From the tower, above the dining-hall, we heard the "Westminster Chimes."

It was dinner hour at Mont-Lawn. The children came in companies, as bright and happy as angels and as clean and orderly as soldiers on dress-parade. They sang "grace," and then ate graciously. Poor children from the crowded tenements of New York, cleanly and neatly dressed, seated at tables beautifully provided with whole-some food, well cooked. In this dining-hall I saw three hundred and twenty-five spoons, each one in the hand of a child, spoons ris-ing and falling, up full and down empty. They were ordinary spoons, but in the sight of God they were extraordinary. One spoon of gold trans-formed into three hun-dred and twenty-five. Medicine spoons no longer needed, food spoons enjoyed! From the spacious dining hall the children could see the Hudson River, like a silver cord bind-ing the mountains and valleys into a paradise.

When They Kneel at Night

After dinner they went out to worship-play around the flower beds and fountains, across the lawn and up the mountain side. At three o'clock the chimes were again heard, and the Chil-dren's Temple was soon crowded with a happy congregation of

New Proofs of the Flood

A Tablet from Nippur, 4,100 Years Old, Corroborates the Bible Story

A SMALL piece of hardened clay, upon which are traced the written signs of a language spoken 4,000 years ago, but now many centuries a "dead" language, is just now the focus of attraction among antiquarians and Bible scholars throughout the globe. This fragment of baked clay was found, with many others, at Nippur, in Babylonia, by Professor Herman V. Hilprecht during his last expedition.

A correspondent writing of this wonderful tablet says: "It has been deciphered by Professor Hilprecht after months of labor. It is simply amazing in its coincidence to the Bible story of the Deluge, to which it tallies in minute details. In this, as in the Bible story, the Lord God, the great King of the Gods of the ancient Sumerians, says: 'I will loosen the confines of heaven. A deluge I will make, and it shall sweep away all men together.'

"Even the errors in the translation of the Bible text from Hebrew to English and German mark the striking similarity between the Nippur story of the Deluge and that of the ancient Hebrews. For Professor Hilprecht points out that the word which the translators of a few hundred years ago rendered 'window,' and which appears in all later versions of the Bible as 'window,' really meant 'roof' in the old Hebrew. Where our Bibles say 'A window shalt thou make to the ark,' it should have read by correct translation, 'A roof thou shalt make to the ark.' This tablet story of the Deluge, written 2100 B.C., which Professor Hilprecht has translated, contains this very command. The Lord of the Gods says: 'With a strong deck (or roof) cover it.'

"This tablet, or rather this fragment of a tablet, with the story of the Deluge seems destined to be the most famous discovery in all Assyrian research. The history of Abraham is really only a secondary figure in this new development of ancient history. The chief fact brought out is that the people of Ur, from which Abraham came, the people of the plains of Shinar, the seat of that twilight civilization, had a story of the Deluge almost identical with that of the Old Testament, which has been the centre of religious discussion for years.

"The writing on this latest tablet was traced on the surface in characters which greatly resemble the Chinese method of writing of the present day. Because of its long time in the earth the tablet was incrusted with crystals of nitre, which filled up the characters. Besides, the clay was in a state of decomposition and exceedingly difficult to handle without destroying the tablet and losing the precious writings on it. For weeks Professor Hilprecht worked several hours a day to remove the crystals and to put the tablet into a state in which it could be deciphered. Then he set to work to translate the writing."

MUSICALES AT THE WHITE HOUSE

MRS. TAFT, wife of the President, has selected the musicale as the vehicle of her personal entertaining. That the present mistress of the White House should prefer the informal concerts in her own home to all other means of extending hospitality to her intimates and acquaintances is, however, natural and to be expected, for Mrs. Taft is and always has been exceedingly fond of music, and she is, moreover, something of a musician herself. In years gone by the private musical entertainment has been by no means unknown in what might be termed the category of standard White House social functions.

It should be explained at the outset, in any mention of Mrs. Taft's musicales, that especial significance attaches to these little concerts because they represent the preferences and the wishes of Mrs. Taft as Mrs. Taft, rather than as the first lady of the land. It is not meant, of course, that the mistress of the Presidential mansion can ever be entirely disassociated from her official position. She cannot. But all the same, it is the prerogative of every occupant of such position to indulge herself with some private and personal entertainments quite apart from the formal affairs that, according to time-honored custom, must be given.

It is because of this significance that an invitation to one of Mrs. Taft's musicales is regarded by each recipient as an especial compliment. To the great receptions and even to the state dinners, which are held at intervals during each official social season at the White House, are bidden many persons with whom the first lady of the land has little more than a bowing acquaintance, but who are included in the list of guests because their official positions or their past services to the country entitle them to it. With Mrs. Taft's musicales, however, the situation is quite different. These are essentially her own private affairs, and there being no official significance attached, she invites just whom she chooses without reference to whether they are in public or private life, or any other hard and fast rules.

The musicales do not begin until 10:30 o'clock at night, and, although this may appear in the eyes of some of our readers rather a late hour, the plan of waiting until nigh bedtime is in reality evidence of kindly thoughtfulness on the part of Mrs. Taft. The late hour set for beginning the programme precludes the possibility of a White House musicale interfering with the plans of any other hostess in Washington. At the national capital an invitation to the White House is politely considered equivalent to a command. It goes without saying that if it was a question of choosing between hostesses, a large proportion of the people would disappoint any other hostess to respond to an invitation from the wife of the President. But with the White House musicales not scheduled to begin until half-past ten o'clock it is entirely practicable for people to go to a formal dinner, attend a reception or participate in any other social event at the usual hour in the evening and yet arrive at the White House in ample time for the festivities there.

The musical programmes are given in the famous East Room, but at the musicales, as at other social functions at the executive mansion, all the rooms on the main or parlor floor of the White House are at the disposal of the guests. The guests enter at the eastern portal of the White House and, after depositing wraps in the long corridor-checkroom, proceed up stairs and direct to the Green Parlor, where the President and Mrs. Taft receive them. From this apartment they are ushered into the East Room, adjoining.

Mrs. Taft

Mrs. Taft's New Music Room in the White House

The north end of the East Room, although, of course, on the same level as the rest of the apartment, is reserved for the musicians. Here is installed the $10,000 gold piano, which has been a conspicuous object in the furnishings of the White House since the early part of the Roosevelt administration. As a matter of fact, this musical instrument de luxe is valued at more than $15,000, although the lesser sum is the one mentioned by most guides and guide-books. It was designed especially to harmonize with the present gold and white decorative scheme of the East Room, and the entire instrument is overlaid with gold. That the piano is distinctively American in design is attested by the introduction of the American eagle and the seal of the nation, as well as the seals or coats-of-arms of the thirteen original States.

Not only are the invitations to the White House musicales issued in the name of Mrs. Taft, but the deep interest she manifests in the entertainments is evidenced by the fact that she personally selects the numbers to make up the programmes—a responsibility for which she is well qualified by her long experience as a musician and music-lover—including conspicuous service as the founder and long-time president of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

During some previous periods of White House history, when the musicale has been in vogue as a form of entertaining—as for instance, during the régime of Mrs. Roosevelt—many of the artists who appeared were amateurs or semi-professionals, who considered an appearance at the White House distinctly a milestone in musical progress. Mrs. Taft, highly cultivated in music, has enlisted the services of world famous artists. Among those who have appeared at recent musicales are Karl Jorn, the tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Mme. Yolanda Mero, Mr. Olga Samaroff and Mr. Ernest Hutcheson, pianists, and Professor Willy Hess, Mr. Julius von Theodorowicz, Mr. Emile Ferir and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the string soloists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Latterly a magnet for the interest of all guests at the White House musicales is found in Mrs. Taft's music room—a personal retreat, into which she has transformed the historic Blue Parlor. When the Roosevelts were in the White House they made use of the Red Parlor as a family sitting room, but Mrs. Taft's preference has been for the Blue Room, and since illness has restricted her social activities she has had leisure to devote to her music, with the result that the improvised music room has come to occupy a very important place in her life. Here she has had installed a dainty little piano, which has been made especially for her. It is a parlor grand empire style, finished in old ivory, with the relief work in gold bronze, the motif in all the details being the same as that of the furniture of the Blue Parlor. President Taft, too, has his own "corner" of the new music room, where he has installed one of the finest of the enclosed-horn or concealed-horn types of phonographs, with a liberal library of those records of grand operatic selections of which the President is so fond.

WALDON FAWCETT.

GIPSY SMITH IN ENGLAND

GIPSY SMITH opened his winter's work in England in the town of Hanley. In his opening he said: "My visit to America has been phenomenal, both as to crowds and general results. Nothing has ever been seen there to compare with it." Some idea of the size of the audiences in the United States, he said, might be gathered from the fact that in one city he had had a choir of 3,000 behind him and an audience of 18,000 before him.

Hanley Free Church Council, under whose auspices the English meetings were held, gave a reception to Gipsy and Mrs. Smith. At the opening of the mission the Mayor of Hanley welcomed the Gipsy and his wife to the town. He recalled the first advent of Gipsy Smith in Hanley. They did not then all look upon him and his co-workers with a Christian spirit, and they were rather scanty in their welcome. But since then they had learned to appreciate the work done by Gipsy Smith and his co-laborers, and now they welcomed him most royally for what he had done not only in England, but in America, South Africa and Australia. The Mayor of Stoke, a neighboring town, also joined in the civic welcome.

The Gipsy made fitting reply. His attitude was one of intense earnestness, and his words were of the most searching kind. He assumed that all present were professing, nominal Christians. But what kind of Christians were they? Did they know what was meant by the term "experimental godliness"? Would their character commend itself to their neighbors? Had they a religion that would create a regenerating and God-given atmosphere? He did not ask to what church they belonged, but he did ask them what kind of Christians they were. Let them look into their hearts, find out, face facts; it would pay them. Whether they knew their influence as Christians or not, somebody else knew. The power of all present with their fellow-men and women would depend on their own intimacy with God. If they wanted a revival they must make a chalk ring round themselves, and ask the Lord to begin in the ring. What did the husband, what did the wife, what did the children—yes, and what did the maid in the kitchen—think about their religion? When ing around, the Gipsy addressed a few words to the choirs. "It is no use," he said, "singing 'Where He Leads Me I Will Follow' when your feet are turned the other way." It was not enough for those present to know they were church members. Were their hearts right? Because, if they were, that was heaven! Was their Master satisfied with them? He wanted to say this, and he was saying it in their own heart at the same time, they would not be able to do much for any one else until something had been done for them. He wanted them to go away saying, "I want to be a better man" and "I want to be a better woman," and if they were the kind of Christians God wanted them to be, that would happen. If they were the kind of Christians Jesus was pleased with, then some hearts in Hanley were glad because they lived in it.

PRESIDENT TAFT SPEAKS ON PEACE

DECLARES WE ARE FOR PEACE BUT MUST BE READY FOR EMERGENCIES

pyright by Drucker & Co.

THE PEACE LEAGUE'S BANQUET IN NEW YORK, AT WHICH PRESIDENT TAFT WAS THE PRINCIPAL SPEAKER

NE of the most important gatherings in the interest of the peace movement was held at the Hotel Astor, in New York City, on March 2, when the American Peace and Arbitration eague tendered a banquet to the President of the nited States. It was a notable assemblage of some the most prominent men and women in the coun-y. Ex-Senator McCreary, the president of the ague, who was referred to by Mr. Taft as the Kentucky peacemaker," presided, and among the stinguished guests, in addition to the President, ere Ex-Vice-President Fairbanks, Mayor Gaynor New York, and Count Von Bernstorff, German mbassador. Flags and flowers decorated the ban-et hall, and the beautiful gowns of the ladies lded a dash of color to the brilliant scene.

The speeches were of a high order, and while all ere in favor of the great movement for arbitration ey were, as a usual thing, conservative and not arked by the erratic and dangerous suggestions r stripping our country of its defenses and de-nders, which have been made in other peace eetings.

President Taft was the principal speaker of the ening, and while his speech was not exactly what me of his auditors expected, yet most of them emed to agree with his dignified position as to hat this country stood for and what it must be pre-red to meet. The main part of his speech follows:

"I am delighted to see about here Ambassadors of powerful countries and Ministers representing the strength of Europe and of this hemisphere, all in favor of peace by arbitration. We are all in favor of virtue; we are all in favor of goodness, and we are all in favor of peace; and as peace can be best maintained by arbitration and conciliation, of course we are in favor of arbitration rather than war.

"But we stand together on this, that because we are in favor of universal peace, and in favor of arbitration in order to secure it, that we are not in favor of our country giving up that which we now use for the purpose of securing peace, to wit, our armament in our army and our navy. I do not want to seem inconsistent in speaking so emphatically here in favor of peace by arbitration and in using every effort that I can to bring to bear on Congress to have two more battleships this year. I am hopeful that we may continue with that until the Panama Canal is constructed, so that our naval forces shall be doubled by reason of the connection between the two coasts, and then we can stop and think whether we wish to go further. Perhaps by that time there shall be adopted a means of reducing armament. Certainly, when it comes, we will not be, I am sure, the power to interfere with that general movement.

"The expense of armament is working toward peace. The expense of war, I am sorry to say, is having greater weight in securing peace than the expense of lives. A nation does not lightly enter upon war now, and for two reasons: First, because the expense is so great that it is likely to lead her to bankruptcy even if she wins; and, second, that if she does not win, the government, or dynasty, or whatever it may be that is in control of the government, is likely to go down under the humiliation of that defeat, at the hands of her own people. Those two things are working in a healthful way toward peace.

"I have noticed exceptions in our arbitration treaties, as to reference of questions of honor, of national honor, to courts of arbitration. Personally, I do not see any more reason why matters of national honor should not be referred to a court of arbitration than matters of property or matters of national proprietorship.

"I do not know that I quite agree with my friend, the Kentucky peacemaker, as to the Monroe doctrine. I agree with the Monroe doctrine, but I think it has come pretty near getting us into trouble a number of times. But we got over it——" [A voice: "Without war?"] "Yes, without war, because the Lord looks after children, drunken men, and the United States."

There was a moment's silence, and then there was a ripple of laughter and vigorous applause at the President's quick response and effective reply, and the interrupter subsided for the rest of the evening. The President concluded his speech with a strong plea for justice to aliens and said the government should have the power to enforce treaty obligations.

NEW YORK'S GREAT TEMPERANCE MEETING

WHAT has been called by well-informed observers the largest and most important meeting held in New York City for forty ars in the interests of the temperance movemnt curred March 20 in Carnegie Hall. The fame and oquence of its speaker, Ex-Gov. Robert B. Glenn North Carolina, the splendid chorus of over four ndred trained voices, and the fact that Carnegie all, one of the largest auditoriums in the country, as packed to the doors, all made it an occasion to long remembered by all those who were fortunate ough to gain admittance.

Governor Glenn is a man of great natural elo-ence, and is one of the prominent leaders of the mperance reform movement in the South; and he d more to do with driving the saloon out of North rolina by a popular vote of 45,000 than any other e man.

Rev. Ferdinand C. Iglehart, D.D., New York City perintendent of the Anti-Saloon League, offered ayer, and then introduced Rev. James Albert Pat-rson, D.D., New York State Superintendent of the nti-Saloon League, as the presiding officer. Dr. tterson in a few well-chosen words introduced -Governor Glenn, who was warmly greeted and ade to feel at once that he was among friends. e said in part:

"I have not always been an absolute teetotaler. I n ashamed to say that I used to lay it to St. Paul and take a little for my stomach's sake and mine oft infirmities, and that those oft infirmities became very oft indeed. But not for many years has a drop of the cursed stuff gone into my stomach, nor ever will. I've seen what the demon can do. Of seven of my college friends two are in the grave, three are in insane asylums and two are a disgrace to the name of North Carolina, all through that demon.

"I've heard the moans and groans and shrieks of agony going up to Almighty God from the asylums and learned that 33 1-3 per cent. of the victims are there through drink; I've visited the old soldiers' homes and learned that 50 per cent. of the inmates are there from the same cause, and almshouses and learned that 70 per cent. of those there sheltered are there from this same curse.

"Because I have seen these things, and oh, my God! because I have felt these things, I have dedicated the rest of my life to the cause of fighting this terrible, damning evil. If it brings crime instead of law, disease instead of health, rags instead of clothes, how dare you, how can you stand for this curse in the State of New York? I come to appeal to the manhood and womanhood of the Empire State and of the greatest city in the world to get into action here to-night, so that in five, ten or twenty years God shall be glorified and the curse of this temptation be abolished.

"New York, whose forefathers stood with Washington at Valley Forge for freedom, who stood at Yorktown; New York, who furnished the bravest that confronted the South from '61 to '65—how long will its freemen submit to being governed and controlled by the whisky ring? Why does this whisky ring through the Legislature keep its hands about your throats? Because they know that if they give you the right to vote for local option, in five years there won't be a saloon in New York State, and I believe New York itself would be found right in line. North Carolina, which in 1881 went 103,000 for liquor, in 1907 went 45,000 for God, all through the progress of local option. You'll call me back once more before I die to celebrate with you the victory and a saloonless State."

Rev. P. A. Baker, D.D., National Superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League, made a short address, after which subscription orders were passed and $18,000 was raised for the fund for the anti-saloon campaign. Rev. Robert Bagnell, D.D., of Brooklyn, spoke briefly, and then Rev. Robert S. MacArthur, D.D., pastor of Calvary Baptist Church of New York, pronounced the benediction. At the close of the meeting Dr. MacArthur said to friends on the platform: "I have been in New York City for forty years. I have never seen such a great temperance meeting as this in the size of the audience, in its enthusiasm, and in its prophecy of future victory."

National Power an Aid to Peace

"PEACE," said wise old Benjamin Franklin, "may be purchased at too high a price." President Taft, in his recent speech at the Peace League dinner in New York, gave expression to the same opinion when, speaking as an avowed advocate of conciliation and arbitration, he urged that our national love of peace should not lead us into the fatal blunder of being unprepared for the possibility of war. Real peace—the peace that gives opportunity for progress in civilization—is the offspring of power. Recognizing this as a fundamental truth, the President urged that we should continue increasing our naval strength, so that our forces may be doubled when the Panama Canal is finished and it becomes necessary that we should guard it as a public highway for the world's commerce, which must not be left at the mercy of any grasping power that might seek to control it for its own benefit. Then, and not before, said the President, would be time enough to consider the question of reducing our armament.

We love peace, but we should abhor weakness. To become pusillanimous as a nation would be to invite grave dangers from every side. We must look the fact squarely in the face that in the present condition of human affairs, that nation which is strong and well prepared for all contingencies has the best assurance of continued peace and prosperity for itself, and is best equipped to advance the cause of peace throughout the world. Until the millennium comes, when love will have universal rule, there can be no peace on earth that is not the result of the co-operation of strong governments in the interest of conciliation, arbitration and international justice.

The Collapse of Drews

PEOPLE who till lately regarded Berlin as the centre of European free thought and scepticism, and the nursery of destructive Biblical criticism, will now have to revise their opinions. About a month ago we called attention to the furor created by the lectures of Professor Drews, of Karlsruhe, who, speaking before great and distinguished audiences in the German capital, attempted to prove that no such person as Jesus Christ ever existed. This surpassing exhibition of ignorance and impiety was fully dealt with in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at the time. Setting aside the Christian as well as the pagan evidences, we showed that the Karlsruhe professor had never even heard of the record of Jesus' life, teaching, accusation, trial and execution, as recorded in every copy of the Jewish Talmud prior to 1631 A.D. And now the people of Berlin—not the college professors, but the "common people," who still cling to their simple old Lutheran faith—have recorded their opinion of this blasphemer by rising up in defense of their Lord and Master, whose very existence had been denied. They held such a gathering as Berlin probably had never witnessed before. Thousands thronged the Winter Circus, other thousands the Royal Cathedral, while twenty thousand filled the streets. This great body of men and women indoors and out, united in a memorable thanksgiving service, giving glory to God for the unshaken faith of the German people. Kaiser Wilhelm's chaplain, Dr. Dryander, in a sermon in the cathedral, congratulated the church and thanked God for the public repudiation of Drews' theories.

We have probably heard the last of this pseudo-theologian and denier of Christ. His collapse was inevitable.

Maligning New York

WE do not approve of the policy, followed by a certain class of orators, of abusing New York at every opportunity and denouncing it as a city of unspeakable wickedness. New York is no worse than other large cities, and it is a great deal better than some of them. Mayor Gaynor, in a recent public speech, took occasion to defend the fair fame of the metropolis, which, with all its faults, is generally admitted to be a very good place to live in. Those who denounce it most sweepingly probably know it least. It is, we believe, the most generous-hearted metropolis in the world, lavish in its charities, great in its churches, and far ahead of most other capitals in every kind of philanthropic work designed for the uplift of the poor and struggling and neglected classes. But New York has a problem of its own such as no other city confronts. It is the most cosmopolitan of all the great cities. We have many times more Jews here than there are in Jerusalem; more Greeks than in any Grecian city outside of Athens; more Italians than Naples itself can boast; more Germans than many good-sized cities of the Fatherland, to say nothing of our contingents of Poles, Slovaks, Armenians, Lithuanians, Finns, Russians, and even Arabians. Some of these people bring with them the vices as well as the virtues peculiar to their native lands, and while they are undergoing the process of assimilation they constitute a big problem, in which we are apt to look at the repellent side only. There is neither sense nor justice in assailing the city because of the existence of conditions which are unescapable. Such a course gives New York a bad name undeservedly, defames it before the world unjustly, and excites the indignation of every sensible American. Orators who indulge in wild rhetoric would do well to remember that no worthy cause ever needs to stoop to exaggeration and defamation.

The Food Supply Problem

IN his recent report Secretary Wilson, of the United States Department of Agriculture, has given us a most important addition to the literature which deals with the high cost of living. His report is based on a systematic investigation, conducted by the Bureau of Animal Industry, in fifty American cities. It is shown that the average retail price of beef is more than 30 per cent. higher than the wholesale price, and that the gross profits to the retailer range from 19 per cent. to 60 per cent. Pork has touched the highest point in forty years, and mutton and other meats are still rising. Nineteen million families of medium income are directly affected by this extraordinary condition of affairs. Those grades of beef which are usually the cheapest have now been forced up to a point where they yield larger profit to the dealer than even the better grades. In a word, the meat products of the country are controlled by a trust, which fixes both the retail and wholesale prices and monopolizes all the most profitable retail trade as well. This trust has been enabled to retain this control largely through the present cold storage system. The meat, butter and fish supply is locked up in 558 cold storage plants and, to a great extent, the potato, onion, canned goods, milk, butter and cheese supply also. In monetary value, the food thus controlled by the trust can be reckoned only by hundreds of millions.

Secretary Wilson brings out another point with great prominence. He urges that a careful study should be made to determine whether food kept for a protracted period in cold storage, especially poultry, "is not responsible for some of the intestinal disorders of an imperfect metabolism, from which modern humanity, especially the dwellers in large cities, are so apt to suffer." Investigation has shown that food of certain kinds, held in cold storage beyond a certain point, is unfit for human consumption and a menace to health and life.

The country is looking confidently to Congress to find a remedy for this intolerable situation, under which the people are not only compelled to pay exorbitant prices for food withdrawn from market and practically cornered, but are obliged (unless Secretary Wilson should prove to be a needless alarmist) to face the danger of consuming food which has long since ceased to be nutritious and can only be used at great peril.

Mrs. Sage on Giving

WE have frequently remarked on the increasing recognition by persons of large resources of the principle that all wealth is, in the ultimate sense, not personal ownership, but trusteeship. Riches, like every other gift at our command, are given for a distinct use. Ours is an age of selfishness, indulgence and indifference to spiritual things; yet it is gratifying to know in how many directions the sense of trusteeship is extending. Mrs. Russell Sage is the possessor of one of the largest fortunes in America. She is wisely putting it out at interest and investing it in benefactions that will bear rich fruit in the coming years. She has recently given her views concerning charity and benefactions, and they doubtless represent the convictions of others of her class, who are emulating her example. When asked why she gave so much money away during her lifetime, she said: "I have always believed in giving. When I was a teacher in Philadelphia, at $200 a year, I was willing to give my tenth to the Lord's work. Sickness, misfortune, fires, the forced miseries of life—these wretched conditions I would alleviate. I would also help those who, having lived righteously and prudently, come to want in old age. When Christ fed the multitude, he did not lecture. He just fed the hungry. And I believe that when people are in need they should be lifted out of their condition. Lift them out of sickness, out of all dead conditions, into live ones."

Being asked whether people were grateful for such assistance, she said: "I find a great deal of gratitude; but you may remember that when Christ helped the lepers, only one came back to thank him. Human nature is much the same to-day. I have never been able to analyze why some are apparently ungrateful. The giving requires thought and judgment; but a tremendous amount of sympathy goes out with each gift."

Mrs. Sage has touched the true secret of human helpfulness. Gratitude may come, but we need not look for it, nor regard it as indispensable. If we perform our duty joyfully and with an inward satisfaction of having done what we could in His name we may safely leave all results to a higher power. Meanwhile, we ourselves, perhaps, more even than the beneficiaries whom we help, are made richer and better by the exercise of charity, which is the concrete expression of a Christlike love of humanity and sympathy for others.

Korea's Great Revival

THE "Hermit Nation," missionaries and evangelists write us, is stirred to its depths by great spiritual awakening. It is casting off its ancient idolatry. All the work of the consecrated missionaries in past years, which seemed so ineffective as to be discouraging, is now producing cumulative results. The Holy Spirit is drawing the people mightily and thousands are being added to the Christian churches. Little congregations are being organized on every hand. So definite has the movement become that the Council of Missionaries at Seoul were led by faith to pray and work for one million souls within the present year as Korea's tribute to the power of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. They have invited God's people here and elsewhere to join them in the prayer that this great hope may be realized. Will not the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who have the world's evangelization at heart, unite with them in their petition?

THE BIBLE AND NEWSPAPER

Conducted by FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

Record Price for Painting

OTTO H. KAHN, a leading banker of New York, bought a painting the other day for which he paid a half million dollars, said to be the record-breaking price for such a piece of art. It is said that J. Pierpont Morgan bid against Mr. Kahn, and offered $400,000 for the painting. The picture is a large group of the painter and his family, by Franz Hals. It is eight feet in height and fifteen in breadth. It shows Hals, his second wife, Lysbeth Reniers, his son and daughter, his negro servant and a pet dog. The painting is one of the few by this artist which show a landscape background. The figures are before a mass of shrubbery, and to the right is seen a stretch of open country, with the city of Haarlem in the distance. About eighty years ago the picture was knocked down at auction for $250. Mr. Kahn has lent his costly picture to the Metropolitan Museum of Art, where it is on exhibition now. The fabulous price paid for this picture calls to mind some other very costly paintings: Holbein's "Christina of Denmark," $350,000; Velasquez's "Venus and Cupid," $225,000; Gainsborough's "Duchess of Devonshire," bought by J. P. Morgan, $150,000; Rubens' "Grand Duke," $125,000; Sir Joshua Reynolds' "Lady Betty Delme and Children," $110,000; Holbein's "A Landscape," $100,000; Van Dyck's "Charles I and Family," bought by Robert D. Evans, $100,000.

The picture is the masterpiece of a great artist and is very valuable, and the more so because the hand that wielded the brush will paint no more. It is an encouraging sign when men can turn their attention and money from the business of money getting and bestow them upon thoughts, beauties and truths. It is a healthful sign in this material age to see men turn to the ideal and spiritual. The masterpieces of fine art are the reflections of infinite thought and beauty, and we touch the mind and heart of the absolute when we feast our souls upon them. With the eye of faith and devotion we may see the Author of all beauty as our joy and life. Christ makes reference to the superiority of the intellectual and spiritual over the material in his question:

Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment? (Matt. 6:25.)

Christianity's Numerical Strength

Mr. Gladstone, a little time before he died, stated that there were more adherents to Christianity than to any other religion in the world. Recent statistics given by M. Fournier de Flaix show that the Christians now living number 477,080,158. He gives to Confucianism 256,000,000, to Hinduism 190,000,000, to Mohammedanism 175,000,000, to Buddhism 147,000,000, to Taoism 43,000,000, to Shintoism 24,000,000, and to polytheistic systems 117,000,000. The population of the globe is estimated at 1,420,000,000, and hence by the figures of the statistician the adherents of Christianity are 31,000,000 more than those of Confucianism and Hinduism combined, and 155,000,000 more than those of Mohammedanism and Buddhism combined, which would be more than those of Mohammedanism, Buddhism and all the polytheistic systems of the earth. The wonder of the world is the marvelous growth of Christianity. A hundred years ago there were only 200,000,000 Christians. This increase is largely due to the work of foreign missions, which have permeated every land, and which undertake no less a task than the redemption of the world in our generation. In almost all the nations of the Far East a considerable number of Christians can be found among the leaders in the parliament, the army or navy, or some department of statesmanship or education. There are fifteen members of the present Japanese Parliament who are Christians, and several conspicuous figures in the war between Japan and Russia were followers of Christ. It is believed that forty per cent. of the population of Japan are now directly under Christian influence. Korea is coming into the kingdom of Christ so rapidly that there are not enough missionaries to care for those who are asking the way of eternal life.

But the increase of numbers, important as it is, is not half so important as the possession of that personal vital godliness which ought to characterize every professed follower of Christ. The Holy Ghost arousing a soul-saving church is fulfilling the prophecy of the Psalmist more rapidly than our fathers could have dreamed:

All kings shall fall down before him; all nations shall serve him. (Ps. 72:11.)

Titles Fading and Faked

It is surprising to see how many illustrious French names have disappeared during the nineteenth century. The oldest French nobility is traced back to the Crusaders, of whom six thousand bore French names and escutcheons. To-day there are scarcely four hundred French families that can boast of a Crusader ancestry. At the time of the French Revolution there were thirty-nine dukes who ranked as peers of France, and forty-one others, but of all these only twenty-three are left. The House of De la Tour d'Auvergne, which produced the famous Marshal Turenne, is one of the few descendants remaining of the grand vassals of the French kings. Not a single trace is left of the heroes of the Revolution, except in the person of the woman novelist "Gyp," descended from Mirabeau's brother, Mirabeau-Tonneau. Napoleon created five kings, one viceroy, seven princes, three grand dukes and forty dukes, but of that proud number only two ducal names can be found to-day. And yet there are twenty-five thousand families in France which claim to be noble families. In many instances the claim is unfounded, and their titles are nothing but fakes. The character is all; earthly titles in these democratic times do not count for much; time and death treat them as playthings and throw them down, as they have done in France. This passing of the nobility is mentioned by the prophet in his description of the destruction of Nineveh:

Thy nobles shall dwell in the dust. (Nahum 3:18.)

His Last Quarter

"Here's the last quarter I have got in the world. Give me some oysters, and go as far as you like," was the announcement and request with which John Olson, employed on the Scandinavian-American Line, greeted Mr. William Gau, proprietor of a market in Hoboken, as he entered the establishment the other day. As the third oyster was pried apart Mr. Gau uttered an exclamation—there was a big pearl! "Well, that's the best luck I have had in a long time," he observed; "it's a beauty!" "Wait a minute," said Olson, "didn't I buy the oysters and didn't you take the money? My oyster, my pearl; hand her over." The oysterman protested, but the sailor was so insistent that Mr. Gau acquiesced. They went to a jeweler, who appraised the pearl at $200. It weighed three carats, and was of a singularly beautiful white color. It was his last quarter, and he was surprised at his good luck. People are usually surprised at the small amount they receive for their money, and are more liable to get a gold brick than a pearl for the money they spend. Most of the great prizes of life are contained in the plain, every-day, homely duties and affairs of this life. There are precious jewels in the rough shells of oysters if we only have eyes to see them. The rarest treasures in the spiritual world can be had without the expenditure of the twenty-five pennies. They can be had for the asking and receiving, so prodigal is God's grace.

Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money; come ye, buy and eat; come, buy wine and milk without money and without price. (Isa. 55:1.)

No Danger From Comet

Sir Robert Ball, professor of astronomy at Cambridge University, in one of his letters has quieted the alarms that were caused by the views of Camille Flammarion, the French astronomer, in his suggestion of the possibility of a collision between the earth and Halley's comet and the terrible consequences to the human race that might result. Professor Ball, among other things, says: "A rhinoceros in full charge would not fear collision with a cobweb, and the earth need not fear collision with the comet. In 1861 we passed through the tail of a comet, and no one knew anything about it at the time. So far as I can learn, we may be in the tail of Halley about May 12, and I sincerely hope we shall. I think Sir John Herschel said somewhere that the whole comet could be squeezed into a portmanteau." There may be, in the great future, collisions in the heavens and the burning of worlds. But there is every evidence that the Almighty has constructed the sidereal heavens to exist for millions of years and to accomplish his divine purpose. It is perfectly safe for us to trust ourselves to the divine Father, who Is wise in heart and mighty in strength, . . . which maketh Arcturus, Orion and Pleiades. (Job 9:4, 9.)

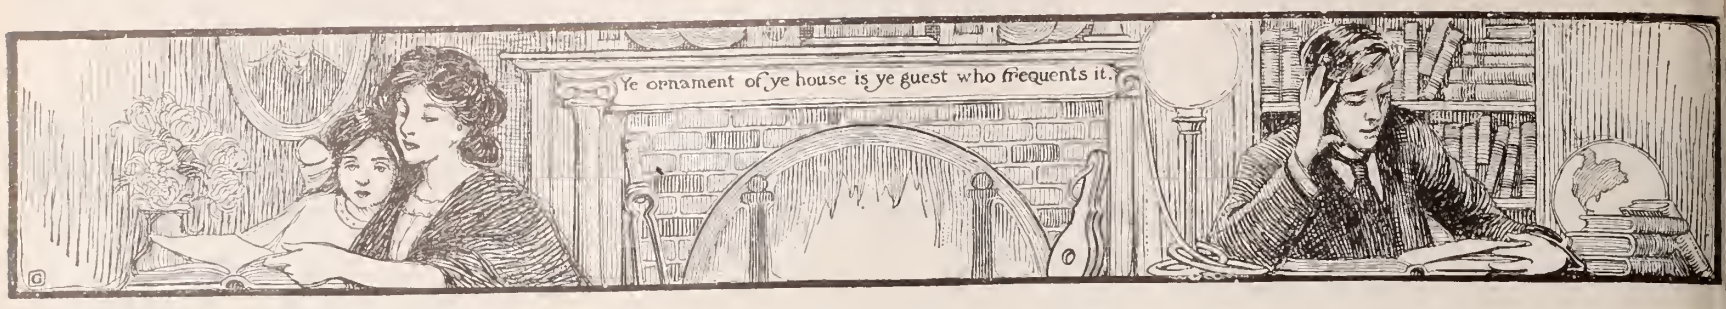
Unfulfilled Dreams

The collapse of the plans of the late Charles T. Yerkes for a great benevolence, and the dwindling of his estate, is one of the surprises and disappointments of the people to-day. After his start as a young man in business in Philadelphia he gained possession of the Chicago street railway system, and, selling out his interest there in 1900, he went to London, where he gathered up old subways and built new ones. He amassed a fortune estimated at fifteen million dollars, and in his will laid ambitious plans for benevolences, including a great hospital in the Bronx, New York City, to cost $8,000,000, and a fine art gallery in that city at a cost of $5,000,000. The Yerkes art gallery building in Fifth Avenue was sold in foreclosure proceedings a year ago, and now, five years after his death, there is an order of the court to auction off all the art collections to the highest bidder. Quarrels, receiverships, foreclosures and persistent claims have wasted the fortune, so that there will not be a penny's worth left for the poor or the suffering, nor a single painting left to the city he proposed to bless. Though a man of generous impulses, there was no love in his palatial residence—his pieces of art were as cold as the marble of a Grecian statue—and he had not quite ballast enough in his life to give reality to the dreams he had of lasting good to his fellow-men. There was one permanent benefaction, however, of his, and that is his Yerkes Observatory telescope at Lake Geneva, Wis., costing $400,000. The mistake Mr. Yerkes made was in not building these great institutions and bestowing these gifts while he had strength and opportunity. Then he and his fellowmen as well would have had the pleasure and benefit of his charity. The wasting of the Yerkes fortune is but another bursting of an earthly bubble, which we see so frequently, in planning to have done after death that which was a privilege and duty to do during the life. The Psalmist makes mention of life's uncertainty and of the vanishing of its vanities:

Surely every man walketh in a vain show; surely they are disquieted in vain. He heapeth up riches and knoweth not who shall gather them. (Ps. 39:6.)

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH



Sympathy at Home

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

A PLAINT in a letter received not long ago suggested a grievance about which women say little, but which they nevertheless conceal beneath a mantle of pride and suffer from in silence. Not all women, of course. Fortunately, there are thousands who have no occasion to complain either of lack of sympathy or of tenderness in the routine of the day, who are helped and not hindered by the considerate thoughtfulness of husbands and children. Others there are who have drudged along the dusty thoroughfare, month after month and year after year, with seldom a caressing word and rarely an expression of appreciation. These tired souls would be surprised if, after leaving the body and escaping from the earthly drudgery, they could hear the praises lavished upon them by their survivors. Many a woman would far rather have flowers in her lifetime than flowers on her coffin.

"I work day in and day out," said the writer of the letter. "I have a family of little children, who demand my constant care from morning until night; three of them so young that they are babies together; yet my husband takes for granted that I never want a change, a drive to the next village or an outing of any description. I have not had a wholly new dress in the last four years, and I have trimmed and retrimmed my best hat till I can do nothing more with it. If I mention this, John tells me that money is needed for things of more importance. Money is never counted if new tools are needed on the farm or there is a chance to buy another acre of land. As for sympathy, when I am worn out and sick, I never receive it. 'What in the world makes you so cross?' is usually what I hear. If it were not for the children, I should be glad to lay my head on the pillow some night and never waken again."

A letter like this is the outcome of a mood of melancholy. The woman who unveils such a state of mind, and exposes the skeleton in her closet that menaces her happiness, is suffering from exhausted vitality. Physically she is below par. Spiritually she needs reinforcement. If her husband has grown callous and insensitive, if he is no longer the lover and forgets that she was once his sweetheart, he is incurring serious responsibility. There are women to-day under treatment in sanitariums because they have lost mental poise and are on the brink of mental derangement, who might have been spared their suffering and have maintained their health and good cheer if they had received fair treatment at home. Sympathy in the household is a good investment. Nobody sinks beneath drudgery if it is shared and halved, as it should be, by the comrade who is walking abreast on the journey. Not the lack of a new gown, nor the shabbiness of an old hat, is so really a disturber of a wife's peace as the fact that her husband takes her constant service for granted and fails to notice that she is tired beyond the limit of her endurance.

What is imperatively needed in happy home life are, first of all, justice, equal rights and common privileges; and next, sympathy, politeness and mutual consideration. It is a pity that so many of us recklessly spill upon the ground the sweet draught of happiness, that we might drain day by day from the cup of life.

Treat your wife as you did your sweetheart, treat your husband as you did your lover, might be enjoined upon both wives and husbands. Friction, irritation and disaster would be averted by this simple course of action.

The Best Manners

Here is a quotation from a letter: "My friend is going away from home to live in a city, where much more will be expected of her than has been exacted in the place where she has been brought up. She is afraid that her manners will seem boorish and rude to the people among whom she will live. How is she to learn what she ought to do? How shall she understand what to do at a table where there are forks and spoons at either side of a plate? Suppose she has to receive or return calls, and she is sure the people are criticising her on account of her ignorance? Will she not be awkward and decidedly uncomfortable? Is etiquette to be learned out of a book?"

A great many young people who have lived apart from what they consider the great world are as anxious and uncertain as this young woman is, and feel as she does, extremely timid lest they shall transgress conventional rules. They give themselves a great deal of unnecessary trouble, for when brought to the actual test they will discover that the rules of politeness are very simple. All the novice needs is quietly to look on and unobtrusively imitate the manners of those she meets. About the forks and spoons, the usual custom is to use one at a time, beginning in each case with the one farthest removed from the plate. If in doubt, observe the lady at the head of the table and imitate her.

In receiving callers, give them a very cordial welcome. In returning calls, do not stay too long; and, should other friends arrive after you do, take your leave without very much delay, so that your hostess shall be free to give attention to them. Common sense and kindness of heart are the foundations on which good manners rest.

"NOW—LOOK PLEASANT, DO"

THIS photograph, which was forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by Mrs. Lucretia George, of Hampton, Ia., is a picture of her two little grandsons—the larger four and a half years old, the smaller two years. The father of the children is a photographer, which profession it is their delight to imitate. The elder has got hold of a toy camera, and at the moment of exposure he is putting the usual caution to his little brother: "Now, look pleasant, do." It seems quite unnecessary, as the little fellow is smiling with amusement at the whole process.

Line Upon Line

"WHY did you repeat the same thing to tha child twenty times?" was the question onc asked of famous Susanna Wesley by friend, who was impressed with the mother's pa tience in the teaching of a little son. "Because nine teen times was not enough," was Mrs. Wesley's an swer, and it deserves to be considered and adopte by many a twentieth century mother. In the train ing of little children there must be line upon line precept upon precept, the same thing said over an over, the same lesson enforced, until gradually goo habits are formed. Modes of speech and gentle man ners are never learned in a day. Long before a infant has arrived at the end of its first twelve month the beginnings of its habits have taken fain shape, and later those habits will be fixed. Mother should be willing to remind thoughtless little peopl again and again that they are not to throw thei toys and clothes about, but that each article is to b put into a place of its own, where it may readily b found when wanted. Usu ally it is much easier to pic up after a child, to set th house in order without cal ing upon little hands an little feet, than to guid them into the ways of neat ness and responsibility. Ye for the good of the chil there should be line upo line. The girl of sixtee who goes to a friend's hous to make a visit, and wh proves herself persona no grata to her friend's mothe beca e she is careless, heed less and inconsiderate, prob ably has not had the advar tage of vigilant training i early childhood. The chi dren of a certain brothe and sister residing in th same town were conspicu ously different in their de portment, those of the on family being gentle mar nered, unselfish and charm ing, while those of the othe were forward, aggressiv and disagreeable. "Mr Blank," said a life-long friend, "was fortunate i his marriage. His wife ha the traditions of good breed ing behind her, and she ha been more than assiduous i the early training of he sons and daughters. Mr Blank's sister married ou of her own sphere, and i her case Tennyson's axion has been verified: "As th husband is, the wife is." Her children have bee permitted to do as they pleased, to grow up in ignor ance of common civility, and to select their com panions with the widest liberty."

Line upon line must be the rule if we would in ou own persons, as well as in those whom we teach an train, have courtesy so practised that it is automati and seems the natural result of kind thought an good feeling. Somebody, speaking the other day o a man in middle life who was honorable, useful an worthy of respect, remarked, "What a pity it is tha Mr. W. makes so many breaks!" It is attention t the little nice things that makes one man a gentle man while another is a boor. The French call th little nice things "les petit soins," and the phras means a trifle more than its English equivalent o the little cares. The boy who never allows hi mother to stand while he sits, who opens the doo for her to pass through and removes his hat when h meets her on the street has been trained line upo line in the practice of the little acts of politeness tha take off the rough edges from daily intercourse.

Little acts of kindness. little words of love,
Make our earth an Eden like the heaven above.

A King's Remarkable Message

ING GUSTAVUS of Sweden is a monarch of pronounced Christian nciples. His latest annual message fm the throne, delivered lately, is o which deserves to be read everyvere. It is a model for other royal rers to follow. It appears in full in V-kobladet, a leading Swedish religus journal, and a translation by

King Gustavus of Sweden

R. A. E. Elmquist, pastor of the Fst Swedish Congregational Church oPerth Amboy, N. J., which he kally made for THE CHRISTIAN HERA, is given below. King Gustavus sa:

"Again a year is ended, during wch the Lord has let us in rich measu enjoy his mercy and his goodness. Fm war and pestilence we have been spred, and the wells of earthly nourisnent and of light for the spirit he been flowing abundantly. The bevolences the Lord thus has given uo share speak their silent but powenl language, and bid us thank God, fm whom every good gift comes. A that has been needed for our welfe God has given us. For adversiti we have ourselves to blame. What he we given unto each other? Have wgiven what we could, and ought to g, of active love, of willing sacrifice, ofattle against evil?

"Among the different classes of the population enmity prevails, which threatens to be a peril to the community. The doctrines of envy and hatred are proclaimed. The blessing of diligent labor is not esteemed, and the conflict in progress has caused the land heavy losses of spiritual and material values.

"And what have we given unto God? Who among us have devoted unto him due thanks and obedience? Many have openly reviled him, trampled his commands under their feet, and let his image, which they carry within them, be deformed and debased through vice. To those who forsake God there come misfortune and sorrow. Ingratitude toward our greatest Benefactor makes an unthankful, discontented and hard heart. The inner evil produces foolish acts, which destroy earthly happiness. Real joy to the soul cannot spring from a guilt-burdened conscience and an impure heart. We must still cry after a great awakening, that will call the people back to the God of our fathers. To have this awakening, each of us must confess his transgressions and his omissions, and seek to gain pardon, new love and power. May there be many more among us who supplicate God to cure our ills. The Lord answers those that seek him. Just as pure and bright, just as consoling and hope-inspiring as before, shines the figure of Jesus Christ, whose soul suffered anguish for us and who bore the sins of the world. He continues to gather to himself souls that thirst after truth, peace of conscience, purity and power. In him was God reconciling the world unto himself. He has, once for all, torn down the partition-wall between people who have harbored bitter enmity against each other. He is also the One who can bring peace to our divided people. His Spirit will melt down all envy and hatred.

"Jesus Christ is the Light of the world and the Saviour of the world. Therefore, if we receive his Spirit we shall, with love in our look, survey the earth and long for the time when all mankind shall know their God and Saviour. Is such a desire real in and among us? Then the messengers who go out from us to the heathen world can present their message not only as an expression of their own faith and love, but also as a love greeting from a people who, in the Gospel of Christ, find their liberty, their progress, and their hope. GUSTAVUS."

ADVERTISERS WHO ARE NOT FRAUDS

F you have a misunderstanding with any of our advertisers you should make it known at once. Do not wait until the incident has passed out of all reckoning, because then the advertiser may not feel warranted in making good a loss that may have been sustained. For instance, the following is part of a leer received from one of our old subscribers, who has read our guarantee:

"About the ads in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD I was swindled out of $5. It w on account of ..... It was eight years ago. I do not like to see sh an ad in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is too good a paper," etc.

Now the advertiser referred to is not a swindler, but a reputable business m, who positively agrees to refund the money in every case where the goods d not suit, and we know of one case where he has done so a year after the purcse. But it would be manifestly unreasonable for us to ask him to refund mey on a purchase eight years old, although at the time of the purchase he wld, we are sure, have been perfectly willing to do so. And here for eight yrs he has been resting under an undeserved stigma, which might have been moved had the subscriber written at once.

We wonder if there are any more of you who have been regarding some of o advertisers as frauds, and blaming THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for exploiting tm simply because you did not take the trouble to investigate.

We do not wish to bring down upon us an avalanche of correspondence conc ning old matters, but in the present and future we urge that you write advertirs at once when you have a legitimate complaint to make; and, indeed, prompt a on is conditioned by the terms of our guarantee, which is as follows:

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE Cristian HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, w must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the atertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within one month of the date of th appearance of the advertisement.

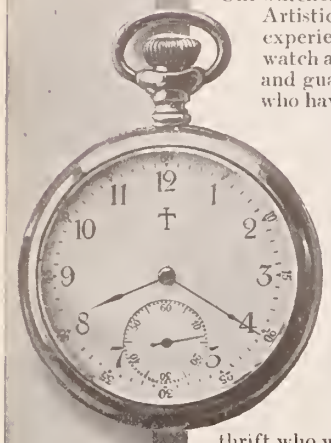
Ingersoll-Trenton

The Standard Watch
As Time Goes On

Jeweled—tested—guaranteed. In beautiful 20-year gold-filled cases—NINE DOLLARS.

Take an Ingersoll-Trenton in your hand; look at it critically; feel it; wind it. Then put it in your pocket; consult it; depend on it. It will not fail you. It is our business to make fine watches for people to whom the exact time is important. We are successful watchmakers. More than one-half of all the watches made in the United States come from our factories. Our watches are right mechanically. They keep time, and wear. Artistically they delight the eye. Into each watch we put experience, skill, conscience and ideals. Back of each watch are our name and guarantee. The worth of that name and guarantee is known to seventeen millions of people who have bought our watches and tested their faithfulness.



The Ingersoll-Trenton is our masterpiece. Into it has gone all our watch-knowledge and watch-inspiration. It is a living, ticking, time-keeping realization of our ideas as to what a good watch ought to be. The whole watch is completed under one roof. We make the works, fit them to our special cases; we regulate the time in our own factory before shipment and guarantee it to the buyer. No other watchmakers do all of these things. We also fix the price, and advertise it so that you cannot be overcharged.

The Ingersoll-Trenton is sold by 6,000 enterprising and responsible jewelers throughout the United States. It is bought by people of intelligence and thrift who want a jeweled watch for nine dollars—one that will "stand up" and tell time for twenty years and more.

Ask your jeweler to show you an Ingersoll-Trenton. It is one of the sights of the world of watchmaking. If he can't do it, ask him why. Then write and tell us his answer; and we will write both you and him and see if we cannot arrange to have the two of you get together in this most important watch transaction. But first ask to see the Ingersoll-Trenton; put it up to your jeweler. It is his special business to give you the best watch at the best price. See that he does.

Here is the full schedule of Ingersoll-Trenton prices:

$5 in solid nickel case $7 in 10-year gold-filled case $9 in 20-year gold-filled case

The famous Ingersoll Dollar Watch continues to be the world's best seller. It is the watch for the masses. It originally set the pattern and the pace for all low-priced watches that are worth while and is still ahead. It is sold by 60,000 dealers.

We have published a little book, bound in an embossed cover. It contains five facts worth five dollars to anyone who is ever going to buy another watch. The title of this book is "How to Judge a Watch." What is your address? We would like to send you a copy with our compliments.

Our Lookout Round the World

AFTER a long and bitter fight in the House of Representatives Speaker Cannon has been shorn of his power by being removed from the Committee on Rules. The anti-Cannonites had forty majority on the vote. The committee is now enlarged to ten members. Mr. Cannon remains in the Speaker's chair, but he will no longer be able to exercise the dominating influence he formerly possessed and which it was claimed he used to block legislation. This practically ends the "insurgents'" war, and they will now join with the regulars in carrying out the Taft legislative programme. It should be stated, however, that the real fight was on Cannonism, and not against the Speaker as an individual. It was the methods he represented that were antagonized. That the old campaigner still retains his personal popularity is shown by the vote of 191 to 155, by which he was retained as Speaker. His long political career, however, will probably end with the present Congress.

—ACCORDING to an interview with the retiring Chinese minister in Berlin, Mr. Yin-Tchang, who returns to Pekin to become war minister, China's fighting force will be one of almost incredible proportions. "I intend," said the minister, "to introduce universal military service, and not only through drill, but by education, to make effective soldiers of our young men. It is shameful for our nation—the greatest on earth—to be so weak. I have in the war office assistants who have studied European military systems." A modest estimate of China's army in the near future would be 22,000,000, reckoning the population at 400,000,000 and giving the same ratio that applies to Germany at the present time.

—EIGHTY poultry jobbers have been indicted by a New York grand jury in connection with the prosecutions for conspiracy to put up the prices of the necessaries of living. These jobbers control about ninety per cent. of the total supply of live poultry in the New York market, and it is alleged that they agreed weekly as to the prices they should impose upon the wholesalers and that they combined to shut out all who were not their own customers. Poultry is at the present time nearly fifty per cent. higher than a year ago.

—THE meat boycott is practically at an end. Prices are again mounting, and it is evident that the sixty-day boycott has not produced permanent results. For a few weeks the plan seemed to find a certain degree of popularity throughout the country; but the fascination of the "flesh-pots" soon drew many away from their pledge of abstinence. To-day the prices of beef, hogs, eggs and butter are about as high, and in some cases even higher, than when the boycott began.

—EX-VICE-PRESIDENT FAIRBANKS has returned from his world tour, but has nothing to say concerning the Vatican incident.

—AT A banquet in Albany, N. Y., President Taft and Earl Grey, Governor-General of Canada, were guests, and speeches were made by both in which the warmest expressions of friendly ties between the two countries were a prominent feature. Both confident expectations of continued friendly relations.

—IN the British House of Lords speeches at recent meetings have generally shown a strong feeling against any interference with hereditary principles, and the prospects are good for a very stubborn fight to resist any invasion by the Liberals and their assault of any of the ancient privileges enjoyed by the Peers.

—A TOKYO cablegram reports that fifty Japanese fishing boats were sunk during a recent gale, and 800 fishermen drowned.

—BY a vote of 280 to 3 the French Senate has passed the bill granting pensions to aged workmen. The plan involves yearly contributions from the wage-earner and from the employer. The total payments by the State the first year may reach $36,000,000. Pensions begin at the age of sixty-five after thirty years of service. The full pension will average 414 francs yearly. Farm laborers are lowest in the scale.

—COMMANDER WM. GEO. HAVGARD, who was distinguished in Arctic exploration, died in Copenhagen last week.

—A SAN FRANCISCO judge has lately given a ruling which would have excited the admiration of Solomon. A lawyer, who had just won a suit against a railroad, claimed a fee which his client thought excessive. The court said: "We shall allow him $10 a pound for his legal training." The papers in the case were weighed, and tallied two and one-half pounds. So be it," said the wise judge, "the counselor is entitled to $250. Call the next case." His decision deserves to be recorded in letters of gold for the guidance of future generations.

—HUMAN nature has its vagaries, which are sometimes difficult to reconcile with common sense. A congregation in a suburb of Boston is divided on the question of retaining or dismissing its pastor, because he reads his sermons in a mild and placid manner instead of delivering them extemporaneously with vim and gesture. Some congregations will not be satisfied with brief sermons, while others want "twenty-minute discourses." It is hard to satisfy every taste. This difficult situation is very well pictured by a writer in the Westminster:

One morning, as the preacher took His Golden Text from God's good Book,
He wore a wond'ring, 'wildered look.
The people, from their cozy nook,
Had passed up word—as to a cook.
The polished preacher-prophet shook.

The "passed-up" word was, "Cut it shor
The "shake" was of the wrathful sort.
But wisely keeping from retort
He "cut" the sermon into half—
Kept out the wheat and gave them cha
And thus evolved
The Sermonette.

The congregation grew in size:
All praised the preacher to the skies.
But wise folk noted, with surprise,
That he who used to make them think,
Began by leaps and jumps to shrink.
And thus evolved
The Preacherette.

—Dr. G. Dana Durand, director of the United States census, stated in an interview that by June 1 he expects to be able to report that the population of this country is between 88,000,000 and 91,000,000. He said that he was not worried about race suicide; that families were smaller on account of the higher standard of living; that people wanted better things, better educational advantages for their children, hence the tendency to have smaller families.

—Friends and admirers of the late Governor John A. Johnson of Minnesota are actively engaged in raising a fund of $22,000, the income of which is to be paid to his widow during her lifetime, after which it will be turned over to the university of the State, to be used for the education of worthy students. The Governor left $37,000, but his friends did not think the income from this sufficient for Mrs. Johnson, and the new fund will add $100 a month.

—Another sensational astronomical theory seems to have been given a setback by the recent statement of E. W. Maunder, of the Greenwich Observatory, England, and a noted student of the skies, that there are no canals on the planet Mars, nor any Martians. The markings which have appeared from time to time on the surface of the planet have been a favorite subject of speculation with astronomers, and, as some of them said, these lines were plainly the work of man, the story-writer has bridged space in imagination and imaginary Martians have invaded our planet in Mr. Wells' weird story of The War of the Worlds. Mr. Maunder exhibited lantern-slides, made from photographs of Mars, taken by Professor Hale, of Mount Wilson Observatory, California. They were taken through a sixty-inch telescope. 'On these plates," said Mr. Maunder, 'the canals were not shown. The explanation is that the telescope was too strong to indicate them. The photographs are an enormous improvement on any that have been previously taken and yet there is no indication on them of the spider-like network. The explanation given by M. Antoniadi, director of the Mars section, is a satisfactory one. It is that the supposed canals are the effect on the eye of congeries of dark spots. There never was any real ground for supposing that we had in the marking of Mars any evidence of artificial action. Had it not been that the idea was a somewhat sensational one we would never have heard of it, and it is the better for science that it has now been completely disposed of. You may sleep quietly in your beds, without any fear of invasion from Mars."

—Mount Etna, in Sicily, is in eruption, and twelve new craters are belching forth lava, fire and steam. The lava streams have united near the base of the mountain into one broad river, which is sweeping on toward the towns below. It is reported that the village of Borrello has been overwhelmed and others partly destroyed. A thick curtain of smoke obscures the mountain, now and then lighted by red flashes of fire. The earth has shaken and there are loud explosions from the mountain's peak. Professor Ricco, of Mount Etna Observatory, reported that the lava had covered five miles in sixteen hours.

A Grandmother's Blessing

Dear Mr. Editor: I have been a subscriber to your paper for several years, and want to let you know that I have never in my life had anything to help me so much as reading The Christian Herald. It is simply grand, and the very thing that I want and need in the way of literature. I could not do without it, and think everybody would be made better by reading it. I have received the "Dreamland" calendar, and thank you for it. The sleeping child is perfect and brings the happy past to my mind, when I had young children. I am now a grandmother. May God's blessing be with you.

Famous Christian Testimonies

Congressman R. P. Hobson

Richmond Pearson Hobson, "hero of the Merrimac" during our war with Spain, is a national character. As naval constructor, lecturer, speaker, writer and member of Congress, he has distinguished himself in many ways. Few Americans have had greater opportunities of coming into contact with men of every class and station in life than the gifted and versatile Alabamian. To Congressman Hobson the question was put:

"Is the spirit of Jesus more dominant in business and public affairs than when you entered active life, and is it an advantage or not for a public man to-day to be known as a professing Christian?"

His answer, which is given below, is like everything else he does and says, clear and to the point. It is the testimony of one who knows the American people and who can speak with the voice of authority. We give his letter in full:

My Dear Sir: December 13, 1909.

Your letter of December 8 is now before me, and I am very glad indeed to answer the questions that you ask.

In my judgment, the Christian spirit has never before been so potential in business, in politics, and in the affairs of State, national and international, as it is at this time. Furthermore, on all sides there are evidences of a great moral awakening throughout this country and throughout the world, such as stands without a parallel since the days of the great Reformation.

In answer to your second question, I should say without hesitation: the Christian character not only actually equips a man best for public, as for private life; but the knowledge of his possessing such a character undoubtedly stands to his advantage. Hoping that you may have a prosperous year, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

R. P. Hobson

Little Babies and Holstein Cow's Milk

Practically one third of all the infants born in this country die before they have learned to talk. This death rate is appalling, yet entirely needless. It is just a question of proper feeding and baby hygiene. And right here let us say that just plain Holstein Cow's Milk, that costs no more but does come from big, vigorous, husky cows, full of life and vitality, is the kind of milk upon which your baby or yourself will gain in genuine flesh and muscle.

Consult your physician as to its modification, but be sure to use Holstein Cow's Milk. The medical profession recommends it.

Our book, "The Story of Holstein Milk," contains much information which cannot fail to interest you. We send it upon request.

The Strawberry Handkerchief

A Tale of Colonial Days in Old New York

By AMELIA E. BARR

THE trouble of her husband made Katrina alter her directions to Virginia. She went to her and said, "Listen. Thy father has been quarreling with the Governor, and also with Batavius. See that only kind words are spoken."

Then Virginia put by her wheel, and went to her father. He looked up as she entered the room, and her eyes beamed their sunshine upon him. Drawing her low spinning chair to his side, she leaned her head against his heart, and whispered sweetly:

"Who has been grieving thee, my dear fader? That poor mouse of a man who has shut himself up in the fort?"

"He said thy father was a spy, and a traitor, and a liar."

"Fader, dost thou owe him any bad words?" and she laughed and lifted her face for his kiss. "Had thou not plenty in thy mouth, to pay him quick in his own coin? If not, Virginia will lend thee a few. And so conceited is he of the bits of paper, and the ribbons, and medals sent to him from England and France. You would think he had fought battles and won empires when he shows them." And she imitated the Governor's manner and speech so cleverly that Captain Jan was constrained to laugh at the solemnly ridiculous travesty. "Why don't the Liberty Boys give him a furlough? What is the good of frightening him to death?"

To this tirade she gave a mimic reality by the play of her hands and face, the tones of her voice. Jan was laughing heartily before she had finished, and the sting of his quarrel was quite drawn. Then she added the salve necessary—"You may be sure, fader, he was vexed and sorry as soon as you were gone. Then he would want to say, 'Give me your hand, Van Vroom. In politics we differ, but our friendship was old and tried when the Stamp Act was born'; and so he would go on, for Governor Colden's good side was born with him, and his bad side he has put on like a garment. He does always what he thinks is right."

"I let no man call me a spy and a traitor—that is what Colden did."

"Call him the same. He has been a traitor to the people over and over."

"Suppose he had called me 'Old Jansen Van Vroom, a busybody whom nobody minded'; what then, Virginia?"

"He would have told a lie. Thou art not old. In the prime of thy life thou art. I would back thee against any young man in New York, either to sail, or to trade, or to fight. Thou art straight as a young pine—ten times straighter than Batavius—and if, instead of petting Batavius, thou had to fight him, at thy feet begging thy mercy he would be, in three minutes."

"Batavius is a good fighter."

"Ten times better art thou. Thy eyes are flame when thou art angry, thy arms are long and strong, thy heart could never fail thee. Why, fader, if the sailors in harbor come to fighting, no other Captain will they have, but Jansen Van Vroom."

"But how can thou know these things?"

"Fader, the things we know best of all are the things no one tells us."

"Thou art a little philosopher."

"I hope not. Like Governor Colden I do not wish to be. It is too much. From books I learn very little, but when I sit spinning my heart talks to me."

At this moment two doors opened at once—Madame came from one inside, bringing with her the aroma of hot chocolate and coffee, and the sweet homely odor of freshly cooked wheat cakes and fried chicken; and from the outside door Harry Rutgers and Batavius entered together. Then Madame's prophecy was fulfilled. With hands outstretched, and in his most extravagantly bonhomie manner, Batavius went straight to the Captain.

"My friend, my father, my Captain, I am sorry! Pardon thy unhappy Batavius! Wilt thou not take my hand?"

A little reluctantly Jan took the offered hand.

"Thou hast forgiven thy Batavius?"

"Let it pass. How went affairs today?"

"At 14 Wall Street there was little doing, yet more there than at——"

"I mean not at 14 Wall Street. What about the Stamps?"

"Harry can tell thee best."

"Harry, have the Stamps been landed?"

"Not yet, Captain. The Governor summoned His Majesty's Council for advice."

"Who were the three?"

"Judge William Smith, Chief Justice Horsemanden, and Joseph Reade."

Jan laughed pleasantly. "Very little comfort would they give him," he said.

"Very little, indeed. Judge Smith warned him that the detention of the merchant ship made him liable to suits for damages from every merchant who had any goods on board. Really, the Governor is in a hard position."

"For my part," said Batavius, "I am sorry for him. He goes into passions, and then he manages everything badly."

No one noticed Batavius, and Harry continued his story—"The Congress finished their address to the House of Commons to-day, sir. It has been signed, and is now ready to be forwarded. John Cruger must have the credit of it. A more weighty, just, and temperate paper could not have been framed. It is a straight, powerful presentation of our rights and grievances."

"One year, perhaps two years, it will take the House of Commons to read our Rights and Grievances. Are we to sit idle and wait on the House of Commons? No, no. We have the work and the trade at our finger ends. We can't wait, we won't wait; the Stamps must not be used; our business must not be stopped for want of them. Paper, paper, paper! Paper stamps on the Government's side! Paper Addresses to the Government on our side! What good is there in writing? Men speak out, and if speaking does not avail, they do something; yes, Harry, they do something. Tell me then what is the Colonial Congress going to do with their Memorial Paper, now that it is written and signed?"

"A deputation of its members is to carry the paper to London. Arent is to take them there."

"Arent! About that I shall judge."

"Arent is too young," said Batavius. "He has not much experience, and the Manhattan is a small ship. The Arms of Stuyvesant is more respectable." Then turning to Captain Jan he added, "There might be some good tradings. I have an idea. I will think it over."

"Thy brains thou need not trouble. Arent is going."

"I expected to find Arent here," said Harry. "Ah, there is his step."

At Harry's word Arent entered the room, his face alight and purposeful, his bearing showing his pride in the commission offered him. "Fader," he cried, "the Colonial Congress wishes me to carry the members with their petition to London. They want a swift

CHAPTER IX

THE TRIUMPH OF THE PEOPLE

On the twenty-fourth of October the stamped paper reached the city of New York, but it was not to go into cir ation until the first of November. Dur ng this interval New York was tur ltuously angry and anxious. It was virtually insurgent. Business was at standstill. No sounds of traffic were on its streets, only the multitudinous murmur of human voices, broken at tervals by the passionate shouts of ngry men. For "the Declaration of ghts and Grievances of the Colonis in America" had done nothing to soo e or satisfy the populace. The sor was burning in every heart at that mo ent, and this plaster was too small to ver it, and too far off to give any rel . It was with great difficulty ne were persuaded to wait and see if the overnor, in the face of such opposiiti , would dare to enforce the Stamp Ac

In the meantime the women, though scarcely taken into recognition, were perhaps the greatest sufferers. They had their daily burden to bear, without the strength and enthusiasm of men to help them. Each in her own home burned with indignation and trembled with fear, and their men folk, dreaming, lecturing, arguing on the streets, hardly thought of them. Then no order was possible in houses used to exact site order; meals were wanted at the most unusual hours, sleep was taken any day or night, as convenient to street movements, and every household duty that had been regular as the clock was turned topsy-turvy.

On the third day of this turbulent week, the Stamps, with the sullen, half rebellious permission of the people were removed from the ship which brought them, and placed in the fort. Captain Van Vroom was one of the disgruntled with this measure. He came ashore in great anger, though Batavius was at his side, trying with every plausible argument to prove the wisdom of this course.

"We took oath they should never be landed," shouted Jansen, "and we have let a few rogues carry them into the fort. We are traitors to our own oath."

"We are not traitors, Captain. All the moral and respectable men in New York want the Stamps in the fort."

"All the cowards in New York want the Stamps in the fort. Safer it is for them. More comfortable it is. Their sleep they missed. Watching was too hard."

"Do you think Batavius De Vries is a coward?"

"Well, then, like a coward he talks."

At this point they entered the house, and Katrina faced them. She was in an extraordinary temper, her head was flung backward, her eyes flashing, her whole air and manner that of a woman angry and determined. She carried a jug of boiling water in her hand, and almost threw it down at their feet.

"Take some care, Katrina. What art thou doing? That jug nearly missed the table, and what then?"

"Then, Jan, both thou and Batavius would have been scalded, and so have got what you deserve. Are not the streets of New York big enough for your quarreling? Yes, they are, and into my house you shall not bring it."

"Katrina! Katrina! What is the matter with thee? Art thou gone stark crazy?"

"Yes, and no wonder it is. See now, no more bad words will I have—cowards and rogues and such like names you shall not call any one. Next thing it will be hands and blows, for when the tongue has said its worst, then the hands take up the quarrel."

"Katrina, I am amazed at thee."

"And at thee I have been amazed very often lately. This day is enough; think only of it—thy breakfast was to serve when of dinner I was thinking, and for dinner thou comes when it is time to set the batter for the avondmaal waffles. I will not have such ways! I will not!"

Then Jan smiled broadly, and looked at Batavius. The smile had a double meaning. It said first, "Listen, that is one kind of talk that married men have to put up with"; and the face of Batavius had an evil look of denial on it. It said second, "Try thy hand at making things pleasant," and Batavius turned to the angry woman and said:

"Mother, our Captain is well home, even at this hour. If it come to that, very thankful we should be he comes home at all."

"Such nonsense you talk, Batavius!"

"Truth and common sense I talk always. That is my way. Listen: had I not come between the Captain and the sailors in the harbor—nearly two hundred fierce, angry men—he and they had been fighting the soldiers for the Stamps at this moment."

"And pray what made thee interfere? Captain Van Vroom knows well when to fight, and how to fight, without thy meddling."

"Mother, if they had boarded the sloop and fought the soldiers, there would have been bloodshed and death. An overt act, that would have been, and then civil war, and the city in flames, and the mischief to pay."

"The sloop! What mean you? The Stamps were on a merchant ship."

"The captain of the merchant ship removed them to a government sloop last night, and the sailors thought they could board her and destroy the paper. Perhaps they could have done so, but every man of weight and standing was on the other side—John Watts, John Cruger, John Stevens, Robert Livingston, and others of consideration, talked themselves beyond speech trying to persuade the people to let the Stamps alone. There is a better way than fighting for them."

Himalaya Cloth

TRADE MARK

An Exact Reproduction of the Fashionable Rough Silks at about One-quarter of Their Cost

27 inches wide 35 cts. per yard 75 shades and colors

Women everywhere have recognized the excellence of Himalaya Cloth for Suits, Coats, Evening and Automobile Wraps, Evening Gowns, Shirt Waists, Children's Dresses and for every purpose where real silk is desirable.

It is far preferable to silk because it launders perfectly, never wears fuzzy and has great durability, It is a favorite with the most discriminating ladies' tailors, modistes and dressmakers.

Every woman who examines this wonderful cloth realizes at once that it is as beautiful as the real Rough Silks, and it is no over-statement to say that an expert can hardly distinguish between "Himalaya" and silks that cost $1.00 to $1.50 per yard.

The excellence of Himalaya Cloth is due to three things: the peculiar character of the rough yarns, the care used in weaving and the perfect finish which insures the permanent brilliancy.

Your guarantee of perfection and assurance of the genuine is the word "Himalaya" stamped on the selvage. Do not accept any cloth clained to be just as good. There are many cheap imitations. See the word "Himalaya" for yourself on the selvage.

Ask for Himalaya Cloth at the wash goods counter of your dealer. If it is not in stock, write us giving his name.

"Whom Do Men Say that I Am

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Craf

IT is best, perhaps, to give at the opening of the lesson a brief character sketch of John the Baptist. He was stalwart—not "a reed shaken with the wind." He was austere—not "a man clothed in soft raiment." He was trustworthy—"I send my messenger." He was faithful—"The voice of one crying in the wilderness." He was great—"Greater than a prophet."

How John was stalwart.—The presence of the Pharisees and Sadducees among his hearers, as he was preaching beside the river Jordan, did not discomfit him. On the contrary, he reproved them for their sins in no uncertain language, even calling them "vipers."

He hesitated not to rebuke King Herod for his immorality. A weak man would have kept silence or he would have whispered to others concerning him.

How John was austere.—His raiment was of camel's hair, probably a very coarse cloth, such as was used for the covering of tents and for garments of shepherds and camel drivers. His girdle was of leather, while others were wearing richly embroidered girdles, made of linen and decorated with metal ornaments and precious stones. His food was locusts and wild honey. Locusts were and still are food for Bedouins and Arabs. They prepare them by putting them on wooden spits, roasting them before the fire, or they salt them down, packing them in leather sacks, to be cut off in chunks as they need them. It must have been strong food if they really possessed all of the attributes claimed for them by an Arab from Bagdad, who compares the head of the locust to that of a horse; its breast to that of a lion; its feet to those of the camel; its body to that of the serpent; its tail to that of the scorpion, etc. (Read also Rev. 9:7-10.)

In connection with "honey," as a part of John's food, read Ps. 81:16. "With honey out of the rock." Wild bees deposited their honey on the rocky sides of cliffs and covered them with a dark wax. This became very hard, and was pierced with some sharp instrument by the traveler, who then sucked out the honey. We can imagine John doing this (Deut. 32:13).

How John was trustworthy.—What his great mission was to be as a forerunner of Christ was told by an angel sent from heaven before his birth to his father, Zacharias. "He shall go before his face in the spirit and power of Elijah, to make ready for the Lord a people prepared for him" (Luke 1:17).

How John was faithful.—He preached about Christ as the "Word of God," or the "True Light" or the "only begotten Son of God." The plain of Judea was his preaching place, and his pulpit was probably a hillside on the banks of the Jordan River. He preached in such an impressive manner that almost "the whole city" went out to hear him. If Jericho is meant, the people had to walk two miles or more; if Jerusalem is meant, they had to make a journey of twenty miles or more. The priests and Levites, we are told, went out from Jerusalem on purpose to challenge him with the question, "Who art thou?" They were sent by the Pharisees, the "higher critics" of those days.

How John was great.—He showed his greatness in refusing to be overrated. When crowds were following him, and hanging upon his words, and being baptized of him, he told them that the One who should come after him would be mightier than he—whose shoes he was not worthy to unloose, meaning the strap by which the sandals were held in place. If John had been a man of small soul and mean spirit he would have been greatly lifted up by the following which he had. But he would have glorified himself instead of the Christ. How great was his saying, "He must increase, but I must decrease." Jesus himself called John great, greater than the prophets who were most exalted of men. Jesus even said there had never been a greater man in the world than John, and no doubt must have had in mind Abraham, Isaac, Moses and David and Solomon. John ranked with them, if indeed he did not outrank them. But there were greater than those who should be greater than he. Jesus said, even those who should have the greater light and see even more clearly into heavenly things. The gospel brings knowledge, knowledge brings responsibility, and responsibility opens up the way for noble service.

John in Macherus, Christ in Cap

John was in Macherus and Jesus was in Capernaum. They were about one hundred miles apart! How different the places! Macherus is described as being the boundary fortress in the southeast, toward Arabia. Its safety was of the greatest importance and everything was done to make the place, exceedingly strong by art impregnable. Herod the Great built a town around the hill and surrounded it by walls with towers over two hundred feet high. Herod's palace was within these walls, and the prison was within his palace. Edersheim describes it as "the rocky keep of the Baptist," and one who has seen it very lately, a well of great depth, and a deep cavernous cistern, with the vaulting of the roof still complete, and—of more terrible interest to us—two dungeons, one of them deep down, its sides scarcely broken in, with small holes still visible in the masonry, where staples of wood and iron had once been fixed! To look down into the darkness would shudder in realizing that this terrible keep had for nigh ten months been the prison of that son of the free wilderness, the bold herald of the coming kingdom, the humble, earnest, self-denying John the Baptist."

And there was Capernaum, probably the most important commercial city of the region in which it was located. And being on the highway between nations, all that happened there was carried far and near. John was distinguishing in Macherus, "decreasing" and Jesus was increasing in popularity and fame at Capernaum through the wonderful works of healing which he did and through the wonderful words of his discourses. How great the contrast between the two men in their respective places! Isolated as John was in his mountain prison, his friends, at least some friends, had access to him, for his two followers that had been sent came directly from him to Jesus. Their errand was to ask a question of Jesus. It was John's question, "Art thou he that cometh, or look we for another?" "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world" had said those same lips in the presence of a throng of people. How different in the darkness and damp of the dungeon! Jesus did not rebuke John; let us not do it. Let us learn, rather, that it is not always his way with John, or with any mortal. Let us learn that Jesus loves friends and followers even though a cloud of distrust settles temporarily upon them. Stronger words of commendation Jesus never gave doi so he points to, or indeed we ma say quotes, two prophetic pas-as he said, 'Have you forgotten the ver prophets whose words have fed you hopes, and now seem to minister to ur doubts, have said this and this bec ne stepping stones."

ter seeing Jesus do many miracles he vo returned to John with the messag from Jesus, and the eclipse of his passed away.

"Whom Do Men Say That I Am?"

This was Jesus' own question which he ked of his apostles when they were wit him on journeys of healing and tea ing. And they answered, "Some say ohn the Baptist, some Elijah, and oth, Jeremiah, or one of the prophets. And the most that the thoughtful ew of to-day can say about Jesus is t he is "the human Man who lived live ly" (Weinstock).

"ut whom say ye that I am?" This was another question which Jesus ask his apostles, almost immediately foll ing the first question, "Whom do men ay that I am?" And Peter made a nderful reply, wonderful in its tea ness and wonderful in the scope of meaning, "Thou art the Christ, the on of the living God." And Jesus com ended him, "Blessed art thou, Simon Bar Jonah; for flesh and blood hat not revealed it unto thee, but my Fat r who is in heaven." And then we s that Jesus declared it was on the ock of truth, the divinity of his own rship, that he proposed to build his hurch. There can be no true chu h on any other foundation.

A Carnegie Simpson in his book, The Fact of Christ, says: "Jesus is not one f the group of the world's great.
Hal about Alexander the Great, and Cha es the Great, if you will; Jesus is inc parably greater than any of men yet who would speak of him as Jes the Great? Jesus is apart. He is n the Great, he is the Only." No vis teacher has one thousandth part so ny scholars as Christ has at this mom nt. Two-fifths of the world's pop ation bears the name of Christ, nor fifths of it are under Christian gov nments and recognize Christ as lor by five great monuments: the Lor Supper, the Sabbath, the chu h, the Bible and the sign A.D., yea of our Lord, by which half the lor daily crowns the Christ.

"What think ye of Christ?" We will ask e question of those not generally all inted on the Lord's side.

Theodore Parker says: "We would not measure him by the conceptions wor d by Jewish and heathen confer but by the long stream of light whi e first three centuries after his dea and through them on all time since'

Mrs Cobbe, the distinguished English isciple of Theodore Parker, says:
"Th world has changed, and that cha e is historically traceable to Chr."

Carlyle says that "Christ is the cause of i measurable changes to all people in t world." Richter declares that Jes, with his pierced hands, has lai empires from their foundations, and l the stream of history from its old annels and still continues to rule and uide the ages."

Lecky says: "Amid all the sins and failings, amid all the priestcraft, the persecutions and fanaticism which has defaced the church, it has preserved in the character and example of its Founder an enduring principle of regeneration."

Dr. Bellows calls Christ "the Spiritual Gulf Stream." Napoleon, viewing with wonder the ever-increasing kingdom of the Crucified, exclaimed: "Can you conceive of a dead man making converts? My armies have forgotten me even while living. Can you conceive of a Cæsar as the eternal emperor of the Roman Senate, and from the depths of his mausoleum governing the empire, and watching over the destinies of Rome? Such is the history of the invasion and conquest of the world by Christ, such is the perpetual miracle of the progress of the faith and of the government of his church."

Chesub Chunder Sen, called "the greatest son of the land of the Veda," has said: "In all Christian literature, laws and institutions we see Christ's living influence as a reality. The Christ that is advancing in all directions has touched India, and hence the question she asks, Who is Christ?" Against the statement sometimes made that "such a man as Christ never lived," Goethe, Rousseau, Renan and John Stuart Mill emphasize the unanswerable argument that the story of Christ's life must be true since no one could have invented such a character and such discourses who was any less than Jesus.

Daniel Webster said that "the Sermon on the Mount banished all his doubts about the deity of Christ, for it could not be a merely human production." More convincing still is the power of Christ's words in transforming men and nations. Look at barbarous, cannibalistic Fiji transformed into a Christian community, where the 90,000 Fijians are all to be accounted for in the Christian Church, 80,000 of them Protestants and 10,000 Catholics. Look at Madagascar! And what but the power of Christ has made England and America what they are?

Again we quote Napoleon: "Superficial minds see a resemblance between Christ and the founders of empires and the gods of other religions. That resemblance does not exist. . . . I know men, and I tell you that Jesus Christ was not a man."

Byron said: "If ever God was man, and man was God, Jesus Christ was both."

A Golden Spoon—Sermon

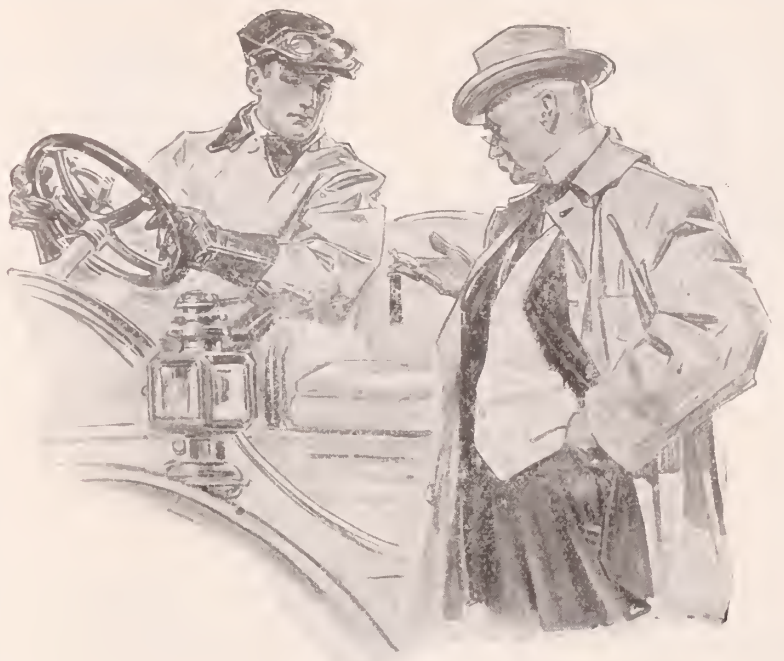
children. In carriages, automobiles and walking came visitors from Nyack and the surrounding country to enjoy the children's worship. The singing was something wonderful, and was followed by a prayer hush like majesty resting on the mountain. The more than three hundred children who in the morning crowded about our carriages to greet and welcome Dr. Klopsch, now thronged the Children's Temple and were led by him in the worship of God. This unique Temple, built for children from Dr. Klopsch's plans and purse, is the crown jewel of Mont-Lawn.

During the summer Dr. Klopsch lived at Tarrytown. Every morning he would look across the river to Mont-Lawn to see if the flag was floating. It signaled the message, "All is well." From his deathbed he left the request that this work, nearest and dearest to his heart, should be continued. He also requested to be buried in Sleepy Hollow Cemetery.

During the summer the children can look out over the Hudson River to where their friend sleepeth. Every night, when they kneel by the bedside, there will be prayers of thanksgiving for the memory of Dr. Klopsch.



The Howard Watch

AS SOON as a man owns a motor car he begins to take a new account of time. And as soon as a man appreciates precision in a timepiece he is in line for a HOWARD Watch.

There are 450,000 automobile owners in the United States and they are rapidly learning that there is no watch for their use like a HOWARD.

Its hard-tempered balance will not knock out of true with the jar and jolt of travel. It is unhurt by changes of temperature or the vibration of the machine. Its adjustment is permanent. Englishmen say it's the most sporting watch in the world.

A HOWARD Watch is always worth what you pay for it.

The price of each HOWARD is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached —from the 17-jewel (double-roller escapement) in a "Jas. Boss" or "Crescent" gold-filled case at $40 to the 23-jewel in a 14-k. solid gold case at $150.

Not every jeweler can sell you a HOWARD Watch. Find the HOWARD Jeweler in your town and talk to him. He is a good man to know. Drop us a postal card, Dept. W, and we will send you a HOWARD book of value to the watch buyer.

The Christian's Sacrifice*

IT is much easier to offer any sort of a burnt sacrifice than to serve God faithfully in every word and deed for a single day.

Ever since time began men have been trying to find easy ways of getting on. They early found that sin was likely to be punished. By all sorts of devices they have ever striven to escape this punishment. During the early times they offered sacrifices. They also bribed the priests in various ways to secure forgiveness and "indulgences."

It will be remembered that there was one prophet who refused all bribes. He could not curse Israel. The vision of the victory of the chosen people was plain to him, and he could not deny it. Thus may we all resist the temptations of the evil one.

It is beginning to be realized throughout all society that there is no short way of buying up the great rewards, or of accomplishing the great results. As one of our leading teachers has said, "We cannot afford to dispense our charities through the ordinary channels, giving money and not service."

Every hand must labor, every heart must warm toward the work, every foot must march. We cannot escape personal labor and sacrifice if we would truly serve.

"There are at least three necessaries in all forms of social service," says Mrs. Elizabeth Hills Lyman. "They are sympathy, humor and tact. Professor Peabody tells us that a science of poor relief has been devised, but where are the persons equipped with the capacity and sympathy to utilize that service?

"It is the hand-to-hand work that we must not forget. The Man of Nazareth began his service many years ago by talking with one here, another there—the personal touch; now the woman of Samaria, now two disciples on the road to Emmaus, now the group in the upper room."

That is what is needed—the personal touch. We cannot stand aloof and still expect to help our brethren, and we cannot talk down to them. We must banish from our hearts all feeling of aversion and of superiority. As Jesus did, so must we walk with all, sharing in sympathy their joys and griefs. Thus only can we really serve them.

One of our greatest poets has given us an immortal sonnet upon this subject. Like most of us, he had evidently considered always that that only was service which involved action, strenuous and constant. But when blindness came upon him, and he had to sit with folded hands, only thinking and talking, he was granted the vision that, while thousands were speeding over land and ocean without rest, doing the errands of the Almighty,

They also serve who only stand and wait.

Thus it may be with us. But remember that he who wrote this wonderful sonnet served his generation with his pen also, putting into immortal verse the greatest Scripture story.

*Topic of the Epworth League for Sunday, April 17. TEXTS: Rom. 12:1, 2; Hos. 6:6.

A Little Verse on "Dreamland"

Dear Editor: Please accept my hearty thanks for nice premiums, recently received in good condition. The "Dreamland" picture is charming and inspiring. It has inspired me to apostrophize it in the form of an acrostic, which you can use as you deem best.

D — Darling little Innocent,
R — Resting in peaceful place;
E — Enchanting is thy perfect form,
A — Angelic is thy face.
M — Music of unseen seraphim
L — Lull thee with sweetest charm.
A — Angels will guard thy downy bed.
N — Nothing shall do thee harm.
D — Dream! Safe from all alarm.

ROSY COLOR
Produced by Postum

"When a person rises from each meal with ringing in the ears and a general sense of rvousness, it is a common habit to charge to a deranged stomach.

"I found it was caused from drinking cof-e, which I never suspected for a long time, t found by leaving off coffee that the dis-reeable feelings went away.

"I was brought to think of the subject by tting some Postum and this brought me t of trouble.

"It is a most appetizing and invigorating verage and has been of such great benefit me that I naturally speak of it from time time as opportunity offers.

"A lady friend complained to me that she d tried Postum, but it did not taste good. reply to my question she said she guessed e boiled it about ten minutes. I advised r to follow directions and know that she iled it fifteen or twenty minutes, and she uld have something worth talking about. short time ago I heard one of her children y that they were drinking Postum now-a-ys, so I judge she succeeded in making it od, which is by no means a difficult task.

"The son of one of my friends was formerly pale lad, but since he has been drinking stum, has a fine color. There is plenty of idence that Postum actually does 'make red od,' as the famous trade-mark says."

Submission

THOU knowest, Lord, the way I go,
My wants, my cares, my joys, my fears;
The plan of life for all below
By Thee is marked for coming years.
Yet Thou dost joy to have me pray,
And spread before Thy mind my cares:
The needs of life—its toils—and lay
Before Thine eyes temptation's snares.

I ask not that my life shall be Henceforth without its cares or needs,
Or even from temptation free;
I only ask that He who feeds
The ravens when they cry—the fall
Of sparrows marks, and clothes the flower—
In deepest need shall hear my call
By giving me o'ercoming power.

And so, whate'er Thou choosest, Lord,
To give of blessing or deny;
However long may seem Thy word
In its fulfilment, I'll rely Upon the wisdom of Thy mind,
That works for my completion; whose
All-seeing plans are ever kind,
Whatever Thou in love dost choose.

The Heat of the Sun

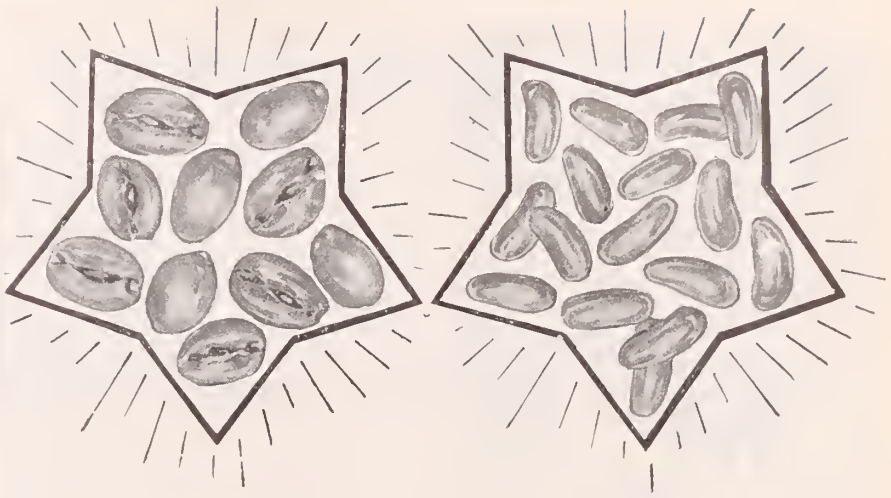
STUPENDOUS figures, representing the luminosity of the sun, are given by Professor Nordmann, a noted scientist of the Paris Observatory. He places the heat of the sun at 6,482 degrees centigrade. He expresses the total candle-power of the sun in an inconceivable number, beginning with 18, followed by 27 noughts. This is equivalent to 1,994,000 for every square inch of the sun's surface. Some idea may be formed of the amount of light these figures represent, from the fact that the most powerful electric arc-light of the present time is barely equal to 20,000 candle-power. As an illustration of the quantity of light issuing from the sun, Professor Nordmann states that from every portion of the surface equal in size to a finger-nail enough light issues to illuminate the entire Avenue de l'Opéra, in Paris, for a whole night. As the sun's surface measures 200,000,000 square miles, its total luminosity may be put at 51,000,000,000,000 times that of the Avenue de l'Opera.

A Great Church Singer Dead

MARIA S. BRAINERD, a famous church singer, died recently in New York City. She sang in many of the leading churches in New York, including the Churches of the Ascension and St. Bartholomew, and in Brooklyn churches. For many years she was regarded as the leading soprano singer in America, and she retained her wonderful hold upon the appreciation of the musical public. She traveled through many cities, singing in concert and oratorio, and in her rendering of sacred pieces, especially Mendelssohn's "Hear Ye, Israel." "Rejoice Greatly" and "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth," the excellence of her voice and her artistic skill won high praise from musical critics. Miss Brainerd's voice was of full volume and extended compass, and she possessed a high degree of cultivation. She was associated with the best musicians of her time, including Theodore Thomas, William Mason, Edward Mollenhaun, Richard Hoffman, George W. Morgan, S. B. Mills, Dr. Lussan, Parepa Rosa, Isa. Hinkley, J. Kimpton, A. Sterling, J. Van Zandt, George Simpson, J. R. Thomas, Carl Formes, and others.

She Didn't Tell

LITTLE DAISY was playing in the room where her three aunts sat sewing. Presently, Aunt Margaret was called out of the room and left her sewing utensils on the table. Returning in a few minutes, she missed her thimble. Repeated inquiries as to its whereabouts failing to obtain any reply, she remarked, "Well, as some vandal has stolen my thimble, I must get another." Dropping her toys, Daisy ran to her, asking, "Auntie Margaret, is Auntie Belle a vangle?"



The Stars of The Cereal Creations

We make sixteen cereal foods, any of which we are glad to supply you. Your preference is ours.

All of the grains are put up by us in about all the likable forms. This is by far the largest cereal concern.

But Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice—through natural choice—have become our most popular ready-cooked foods. By actual test, we have found that four people in five prefer them to all the rest. That's why we tell you about them. We want you to have what you'll like best.

The Scientific Foods

It is good to know, when you choose these foods, that science agrees with your choice.

The process of making Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice was invented by Prof. Anderson. Its value lies in making the whole grains wholly digestible.

In no other process—cooking, baking or toasting—are the granules of starch so broken. In no other way known can cereals be made so easy to digest.

Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are unique and enticing, nut-like and crisp. They are better than you can imagine. But the greater fact is that they wholly digest without forming a tax on the stomach.

Puffed Wheat, 10c
Puffed Rice, 15c
Except in Extreme West

These are the foods shot from guns.

The whole wheat or rice kernels are put into sealed guns. Then the guns are revolved for sixty minutes in a heat of 550 degrees. The heat turns the moisture in the grain to steam, and the pressure becomes tremendous. Then the guns are unsealed, and the steam explodes. Instantly every starch granule is blasted into a myriad particles.

The grains are puffed to eight times their size, yet the coats are unbroken and the shapes are unaltered. We have the whole grains in their natural shape, but made porous and crisp and digestible.

Please Find Them Out

Whatever cereals you now serve, of our make or of others, we invite you to try these two. Serve them alone or mix them with fruit.

Learn how your people enjoy them, and which one they like best. Ask if they want them again.

Please order them now—one package of each. You'll be glad that we told you about them.

Freeport, L. I., Nov. 29, 1909. Enclosed check for bottle "Save-The-Horse." Every horseman around here thought horse was incurable, but don't think so now. Here is what I have done with "Save-The-Horse," and some of these cases were cured two and three years ago, as you know, and are cured to-day. In fact, I am not afraid to undertake any case without the guarantee.

The first case was a gray mare with bone spavin, over three years' standing. So lame everyone thought she would never go sound again. In six weeks' time she did not take a lame step. Let her to the Freeport Golf Club every week day.

The next case was a fine blooded horse with ringbone, belonging to a friend. In two months' time he did not take a lame step.

Also cured a Polo Pony who was hardly able to get out of the stable, both hind legs affected with the worst bone spavin I ever saw. Bought him for ten dollars, and everyone said I would have to saw off his legs and have new ones made. The whole hock was affected. He had been fired and blistered three times. I used "Save-The-Horse," and in ten weeks' time you would not know that he had ever been spavined, except for the marks of the firing iron. Have also cured a fine saddle horse of thoroughpin. Will be glad to see anyone regarding these cases. CARL DARENBERG.

$5.00 a bottle, with legal written guarantee or contract. Won by Reading the Bible

THE following, by Mr. L. H. Snyder, of the Seoul (Korea) Y. M. C. A., is one of the most romantic incidents in the history of Christianity in the Far East:

Mr. Yi Sang Choi, former secretary of the imperial cabinet, was sent to Washington with the first Korean Embassy, about twenty years ago. While there he received from a Chinese official a copy of the New Testament and the Book of Proverbs, written in Chinese. Hearing that this was the book so extensively read by the West, and that it was the foundation of Western civilization, Mr. Yi accepted it with the intention of giving it careful consideration.

He read a chapter, then threw the book down, only to pick it up again, which process he repeated until a year had elapsed; then he became convinced that there was nothing in it superior, if equal, to the teachings of his own great teacher, Confucius. He did not come to this conclusion without comparing saying after saying of the Bible with those he had spent years in imbibing. Shortly afterward he returned to Korea, convinced that there was "nothing in Christianity."

Not many years later, Dr. Jai So Peel, a Korean of noble birth, but educated and naturalized in the United States, returned to Korea under special contract with his government. In his addresses to the Koreans he constantly preached Christianity to them. Mr. Yi Sang Choi followed Dr. Jai So Peel about wherever he spoke, and argued against him point by point, showing in each the superiority of Confucius. It was this same Dr. Jai So Peel who started the Independence Club, and the memorial arch outside the west gate of Seoul marks the event. The doctor is now engaged in business in Philadelphia.

The doings of the Independence Club were noised about and excited the suspicions of the party in power, so that finally a number of the active members of the club were thrown into prison. Among them were a group of eleven men, all but one stanch Confucianists, under the leadership of Mr. Yi Sang Choi. The single exception was a Christian. It was through the influence of this young man, who is now taking a graduate course at Princeton University, that the others consented to make a careful study of the teachings of Christ. They agreed to study separately during the day, each man for himself, and then at night to discuss together what they had studied during the day. Many a night they talked even until daybreak.

Finally one and all became persuaded that the Gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth. They have all been leaders in the Christian Church throughout Korea. One died in prison; another, who became mayor of the city of Song Do, has recently died.

Mr. Yi Sang Choi is director of the religious work of the Seoul association.

The Laboratory and Alcohol

By Cora Frances Stoddard, Sect'y of the Scientific Temperance Federation

PROBABLY the most significant feature of the now international battle against alcohol is the growing intensity of popular conviction as to the truth about the effects of alcohol revealed by the thoroughly practical modern scientific study, which is piercing the oldest and most deeply entrenched strongholds of the alcohol habit and traffic.

The laborer, be he toiler by hand or by brain, hears of efficiency diminished by alcohol. A possible eight per cent. loss actually shown by experiments on muscle and brain power, following the use of no more alcohol than one gets in a bottle of wine or a quart of beer a day, must be reckoned with in the race of the ambitious for success.

For the employer the facts have another story. They hint at what it costs him in productivity to employ workmen below par in ability, to entrust property and the efficiency of a highly organized business to reason and judgment made undependable by alcohol, to become financially liable for accidents to drinking employees.

Consideration of public health and social problems can no longer ignore alcohol. Science has shown definitely how resistance to infectious disease is lowered by its influence on the body defences. Drink must be added to the dread trio, "dark, dirt and damp," as an element in tuberculosis. Ill-health we are told exists in nearly three-fourths of the poverty, inefficiency, and unemployment seeking aid. Alcohol as a demonstrated factor in that ill-health brings the philanthropist and the sociologist up hard against the problem, and puts them, if they will, on the track of ultimate causes.

Cora Frances Stoddard

The work of Laitinen, Forel, Bezzola, Demme, Hodge, Potts, and a host of others in demonstrating the deteriorating effects of drink on the drinkers' progeny presents, perhaps, alcohol's most appalling and most menacing consequences. Deterioration appears in a variety of forms from mere excitability or slight mental instability to dull-mindedness, feeble-mindedness, down to idiocy, epilepsy, insanity, or family extinction. It cuts both ways with society; progress is hampered by the production of inferior lives, while the sound have to bear the burden of caring for the drink-made inefficients.

The compelling influence of these facts in solving the alcohol problem is simply a question of time and of systematic effort in extending knowledge of them. They cut the ground from under the feet of the one who thinks that the sale or use of drink is a matter of mere personal opinion. They reveal the weakness of the belief that self-control in the use of drink is sufficient, since they show that among the very first of its effects alcohol tends to impair self-control.

Taught through home, school and press, from physician's office, pulpit and platform, these truths will grip the intelligence of the people. Such instruction must go hand in hand with all efforts to eliminate the sale of drink. It must even go before, laying in voters' minds a foundation of convincing facts as to the nature of the drink itself. Thus only can we hope for permanent results. The American temperance problem is not only, What shall we do with the saloon? but What shall we do with the drink?

Dark corners of civilization get cleaned up only as the light of truth is turned in upon them.

Good Cheer*

CHRIST, says the inspired account of him, was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief.

Likewise, we are told that man is born to trouble, as the sparks fly upward.

The common course of many lives is that of disappointments and rebuffs, following hard after one another, with only brief gleams of joy between.

This is the cause of the perpetual preaching on all sides of Paul's gospel of good cheer. The prophets also, even the most severe among them, introduce here and there beautiful words of peace and reassurance. We shall be afflicted and tempest-tossed, but with great mercies shall we be gathered, and in righteousness shall we be established.

One source of comfort in human perplexity and sorrow lies in God's beautiful outer world. You remember that in Lanier's strong verses about the Master he went into the woods,

Clean forspent, clean forspent,

But "out of the woods my Master went,"

And he was well content.

For

The olives they were not blind to him,
The little gray leaves were kind to him,
The thorn-tree had a mind to him.

It is astonishing to one who has tried it to see the healing which God has given to us in the world of nature.

Dr. George P. Nichols has eloquently described it in his book, The Preciousness of God's Thoughts:

"God has given the visible heavens and earth a mysterious power to soothe the spirit. Nature is a trained nurse, and as full of sympathies as a woman's heart. Her blithe, sunlit air is a cordial beyond the power of any apothecary to mingle. Her woods are high places full of presences at once silent and communicative. Her mornings and evenings are apocalyptic visions. Her hills, rivers, horizons, moon-rise and starlight are enchantments that lift off the weight of care."

It is as though nature were echoing the message which Christ gave to his disciples, forewarning them of temptations and trials, but saying, "Be of good cheer."

The thought must come to one receiving this blessed earthly comfort,

If here on earth such blessed peace may be,
Though known so transiently,
How deep the peace of God that folds eternity.

But when one cannot seek the consolations of nature, prayer and the study of God's Word can bring joy to the heart, even in the crowded city street and among the distractions of business.

There is unlimited comfort in the thought that God lives and cares for this world.

Right may limp and halt, and seem to fail. Wrong may seem to be in the saddle and to ride mankind—but strive on. Behind the clouds the sun is shining; and likewise behind the clouds of injustice and corruption God's light streams pure and unceasing.

But note well one feature of the salvation from wreck, described by Paul: he told his fellow-passengers that they were to be saved; but they did not lay themselves down and expect to be tossed on the dry land without effort.

No; they set to work to lighten the ship of its cargo of wheat. Then they swam for their lives, struggling and straining.

Thus God ordains that we shall usually secure peace and joy. It comes not without hard and bitter labor; but it comes.

Egyptian Storehouses

(From an Occasional Contributor)

THERE is a striking analogy between the storehouses which Joseph built in Egypt, in the days of Pharaoh, and the modern cold-storage warehouse. During the seven years of plenty which prevailed in Egypt Joseph collected what was practically the surplus crop and put it in the warehouses to keep it for the people, for use in the time of famine which he foresaw. By reason of his divinely-inspired foresight, when the seven years of famine came Egypt was prepared to meet them.

The modern cold-storage warehouse takes the surplus perishable products, and, by storing them in warehouses, where the temperature is properly regulated to preserve them, saves them until the people need them. If it were not for the cold-storage warehouses the perishable products of summer, to a great extent, would be wasted. The natural operation of the laws of trade would prompt those who buy summer products for storage to buy not much if any more than the surplus of the summer. If the buyers should trench to any great extent on the needs of the people in summer, by buying up products which otherwise would naturally be consumed, such a course would raise prices against the cold-storage buyers to such an extent that they would impair their own profits. It is unreasonable to suppose that the buyers of goods placed in cold-storage do more than take up the surplus of any summer commodities. Of course, when winter comes on, owners of the goods in cold-storage warehouses are in a position to demand what they will for the products of the summer, which they have carried over into the winter; but the law of economics controls the situation. Any one can readily see that if those who own the eggs in cold storage were to charge a dollar apiece for the eggs, the eggs would not be used by the public, but would remain unsold in the warehouses.

In the story of Joseph's saving the surplus of Egypt's products of seven years of plenty for the exigencies of seven years of famine the surplus of one period was conserved to be used up in another period. It would have been wholly unprofitable for Joseph to have stored up enough supplies during the seven years of plenty to have lasted fourteen years, or many years beyond the period of famine. In the same way the owner of cold-storage goods would be unwise to store more goods than he could sell, or set up conditions as to prices which would prevent the goods he had stored from being consumed during the period when they are required. He could not afford to hold goods at a price so high that people would not buy them, and which would compel him to carry them through another summer.

The cold-storage warehouse has come to stay, and its usefulness to the public is broadening every season. The fact that, in the evolutionary processes which are bringing the storage warehouses nearer and nearer to perfection, there have been errors of judgment and possibly at times efforts to overreach the market is no more a good reason for the assault which is being made on cold storage, as such, than the fact of a railroad accident would be a justification for attacking and crippling all railroad development by means of drastic and impracticable legislation.

How We Select Our 6% Reclamation Bonds

Our experience with Reclamation bonds covers 16 years. During that time we have bought and sold 78 separate issues of Drainage and Irrigation bonds. All have been secured by first liens on good farm land, and no investor has lost a dollar through default in interest or principal.

We are the largest purchasers of Reclamation bonds, and thousands of bond buyers place confidence in our selections. As a result we are constantly offered the pick of many projects. Thus we are able to select for our customers the cream of these securities.

Our Competent Staff

We employ in our investigations engineers and attorneys of national repute, and of wide experience in reclamation projects. Certified copies of their reports and opinions are supplied to our customers.

The Vice-President of our Company almost constantly travels in sections where land is reclaimed. Thus we keep in close touch with the best undertakings.

We buy no issue of Reclamation bonds until all officers of our Company, and all engineers and attorneys employed in the matter, unanimously agree on the safety of the bonds in question.

The Exact Data

In irrigation projects water supply is now determined by Government records covering a number of years. Government surveys show the area drained by the streams in question. Government records tell the minimum rainfall.

When fertility is in question, soils are easily analyzed. We may know their constituents, and the size and kind of crops they will raise.

Naturally, men don't reclaim land that isn't remarkably fertile. These lands on the average are the most productive farm lands in America. And the question of crop failure is practically eliminated by the control of water supply.

There are few undertakings where the security of a lien can be more exactly determined than in reclamation projects rightly investigated. The Government itself is spending many millions of dollars on such projects, depending solely on the land for repayment.

Farm Lien Security

Reclamation bonds are secured by first liens on good farm land. In irrigation projects the liens are given by land owners in payment for water rights. The bonded indebtedness rarely exceeds one-fourth the land's value. As the liens are paid off in annual instalments the security increases each year.

The bonds are additionally secured by a first mortgage on all the property in which the proceeds of the bonds are invested. Thus we combine corporate responsibility and management with farm lien security.

Some Reclamation bonds are issued by organized districts, so the bonds become tax liens. Some are "Carey Act" bonds, where the State supervises the project.

All are serial bonds, so the indebtedness is rapidly reduced. One may get these bonds maturing all the way from one to twenty years. The denominations are $100, $500 and $1,000. The interest rate is six per cent.

These bonds have become the most popular bonds that we handle. In our estimation it is hard to conceive of any more inviting security.

Ask For Information

Reclamation bonds combine safety with fair interest rate. They appeal to all investors, small and large. Please ask us to send you a new book of facts which we now have in preparation. Cut out this coupon lest you forget.

CHRISTIAN MARTYRS GIVEN TO THE LIONS

CHRISTIANITY is the greatest fact in history. The early Christians endured martyrdom rather than forsake Principle. The picture shown herewith, from Ridpath's History, depicts 87,000 people assembled in the Coliseum at Rome to witness the Christians given to the lions. In such a scene may be read the inevitable doom of the Empire that ruled the world. The blood of the Martyrs is the seed from which Christian civilization sprang. If you would know the history of mankind—every sacrifice for principle, every struggle for liberty, every conflict and every achievement, from the dawn of civilization down to the present time--then embrace this splendid opportunity to place in your home the world-famed publication,

RIDPATH'S HISTORY OF THE WORLD

THE PUBLISHER'S FAILURE placed in our hands the entire unsold edition of this monumental work, which we must sell immediately. The sets are BRAND NEW, brought right down to date, beautifully bound in Half-Morocco. Hundreds have already availed themselves of this remarkable opportunity to secure the greatest History of the World ever written. We have only a few sets remaining. We offer these sets to CHRISTIAN HERALD READERS

At LESS than even damaged sets were ever sold!

We will name our price only in direct letters to those sending the coupon below. Tear off the coupon, write name and address plainly and mail now before you forget it. Dr. Ridpath's family derive their income from his History, and to print our price broadcast for the sake of more quickly selling these few sets would cause great injury to future sales. WE will mail free a beautiful 46-page booklet on history to every reader who mails us the coupon below. It contains Dr. Ridpath's Race Chart in colors, tracing all races of mankind back to the parent stock; a rare chronological chart, the best map of the Panama Canal ever printed, a large map of China and Japan, two beautiful duotone reproductions of great paintings showing "Napoleon Before the Sphinx in Egypt" and "Queen Elizabeth Signing the Execution Warrant of Mary Stuart," together with portraits of Socrates, Caesar, Napoleon, Shakespeare and Roosevelt and other great characters in history; also specimen pages from the History, giving some slight idea of the wonderfully beautiful style in which the work is written.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

CHRISTIAN HERALD READERS have shown wonderful appreciation of our great offer. We have shipped this splendid history to delighted readers living in every State in the Union. Next to the Bible, this is in many respects the greatest work ever written. In the past 20 years over 200,000 sets have been sold at more than double our Special Price, and every purchaser is more than satisfied. More sets of Ridpath's History have been sold than any other set of books in the English language. Can you imagine a greater testimonial for any work? No other history in any way compares with it. The English-speaking world has endorsed Ridpath's as the only History of the World worth having.

RIDPATH in your home means you need never spend a lonely evening. You can associate with the world's heroes; you can cross the Rubicon with Cæsar, after which Rome was free no more. You can sit at the feet of Socrates, the loftiest genius of the ancient world. You can kneel at the shrine of Lincoln, "the greatest character of all time, the gentlest memory of our world." It is ennobling to commune with these children of destiny. To be associated with great men is to be great one's self, and you will add to your store of knowledge which is power, and to the richness of your life.

SEND COUPON TO-DAY

RIDPATH takes you back to the dawn of history, long before the pyramids of Egypt were built; down through the romantic troubled times of Chaldea's grandeur and Assyria's magnificence; of Babylonia's wealth and luxury; of Grecian and Roman splendor; of Mohammedan culture and refinement; of French elegance and British power; of American patriotism and religious freedom, to the dawn of yesterday. He covers every race, every nation, every time, and holds you spellbound by his wonderful eloquence. Nothing more interesting, absorbing and inspiring was ever written by man.

RIDPATH throws the mantel of personality over the old heroes of history. Alexander is there—patriot, warrior, statesman, diplomat, crowning the glory of Grecian history. Xerxes, from his mountain platform, sees Themistocles, with three hundred and fifty Greek ships, smash his Persian fleet of over a thousand sail, and help to mould the language in which this paragraph is written. Rome perches Nero upon the greatest throne on earth, and so sets up a poor madman's name to stand for countless centuries as the synonym of savage cruelty; Napoleon fights Waterloo again under your very eyes, and reels before the iron fact that at last the end of his gilded dream has come. Bismarck is there—gruff, overbearing, a giant pugilist in the diplomatic ring, laughing with grim disdain at France, which says "You shall not." Washington is there, "four-square to all the winds," grave, thoughtful, proof against the wiles of British strategy and the poisoned darts of false friends; clear-seeing over the heads of his fellow-countrymen, and on into another century—the most colossal world-figure of his time!

Roosevelt Refuses to Meet the Pope

Declines a Vatican Reception Because Intolerant Conditions Were Imposed

EX-PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT has declined an audience with the Pope, refusing to subscribe to certain conditions which the Vatican had imposed. The incident has caused a tremendous sensation, both in this country and in Europe. Following so closely upon the heels of the Fairbanks incident, in which the Ex-Vice-President gave up the proposed presentation rather than submit to terms dictated by the Vatican which would have been an affront to his American compatriots in Rome, the Roosevelt episode emphasizes the American love of the broadest social, political and religious tolerance, and the right to liberty of speech.

Negotiations with a view to granting a reception to Mr. Roosevelt were begun while the Ex-President was still in Cairo. Mr. Leishman, our Ambassador in Italy, telegraphed to Mr. Roosevelt, on March 23:

The Official Correspondence

"Mgr. Kennedy, rector of the American Catholic College, in reply to an inquiry which I caused to be made, requests that the following communication be transmitted to you: 'The Holy Father will be delighted to grant an audience to Mr. Roosevelt on April 5 and hopes that nothing will arise to prevent it, such as the much-regretted incident which made the reception of Mr. Fairbanks impossible.'"

Two days later, the Ex-President telegraphed to Ambassador Leishman as follows:

"Please present the following to Mgr. Kennedy: It would be a real pleasure to be presented to the Holy Father, for whom I entertain high respect, both personally and as the head of a great Church. I fully recognize his entire right to receive or not receive whomsoever he chooses, for any reason that seems good to him, and if he does not receive me I shall not for a moment question the propriety of his action. On the other hand, I, in my turn, must decline to make any stipulations, or submit to any conditions, which in any way would limit my freedom of conduct. I trust that on April 5 he will find it convenient to receive me."

On March 28, Mr. Roosevelt, while still in Cairo, received a telegram from Ambassador Leishman containing a message from Mgr. Kennedy, the concluding words of which were: "The audience cannot take place, except on the understanding expressed in the former message."

Mr. Roosevelt's Decision

Next day, March 29, Mr. Roosevelt cabled definitely to Ambassador Leishman in these words:

"The proposed presentation is of course now impossible."

The news of the incident and its abrupt termination was not made public until Mr. Roosevelt arrived in Rome, on Sunday, April 3. When it was known that the audience which had been extended to him, and which everybody seemed to expect would take place, had been canceled by the Ex-President, it became at once the absorbing topic in political, social and diplomatic circles.

On their arrival in Rome, the Roosevelt party was greeted by Ambassador Leishman, Mr. Garrett, counselor of the Embassy, the entire Embassy staff, the King's representative, Conte Tozzini; the Foreign Minister, Signor Vollati; the Mayor of Rome, several other municipal officials, and a considerable number of Americans. The Ex-President was at once besieged by interviewers, but declined to talk on politics, and would not discuss the incident with the Vatican. He was willing to say, however, that the incident should be regarded by his friends, both Protestants and Catholics, in the United States, as wholly personal, and he trusted that it would not be made the subject of needless controversy. He gave out the text of all the telegraphic correspondence, preferring that these communications should speak for themselves.

When it was learned at the Vatican that the correspondence had been made public, there was great surprise, and Mgr. Kennedy, as representative of the Pope, immediately began to issue explanations which would present the incident in the light in which the Vatican desired it to be regarded. Mgr. Kennedy said:

Mgr. Kennedy's Statement

"I was authorized to send Mr. Roosevelt the first message which is quoted in this statement, but the reference to the Fairbanks incident in the message was intended by the Vatican only as a friendly suggestion. Mr. Roosevelt has not given my second message in full. That message was as follows:

"'His Holiness will be much pleased to grant an audience to Mr. Roosevelt, for whom he entertains great esteem, both personally and as President of the United States. His Holiness quite recognizes Mr. Roosevelt's entire right to freedom of conduct. On the other hand, in view of the circumstances, for which neither His Holiness nor Mr. Roosevelt is responsible, an audience could not occur except on the understanding expressed in the former message.'

"No further communication," Mgr. Kennedy said in conclusion, "reached me from Mr. Roosevelt after this."

There is, however, an inside history to the affair, which shows that the Vatican has not changed its attitude in the slightest degree with regard to the policy of suppressing any public expression of sentiment in Rome that might be construed as unfriendly to its interests. When the suggestion of a reception to Mr. Roosevelt was first mooted, Mr. J. C. O'Laughlin, formerly Assistant Secretary of State in New York, discussed the matter with Cardinal Merry del Val. The Cardinal asked him:

A Guarantee Demanded

"Can you guarantee that Mr. Roosevelt will not visit the Methodists here?"

"No," replied Mr. O'Laughlin. "Nobody can give such a guarantee. Roosevelt is just the man to go there if he thinks of it. He will do as he pleases."

The Cardinal raised his hands in deprecation.

"Oh, it is indefensible!" he exclaimed. "It is out of the question for any one to expect to be received by a great personage whose feelings he would be unwilling to respect. No court in Europe grants unrestricted audiences. Even Mr. Roosevelt himself," he added, "when he was your President, refused to receive persons unconditionally at the White House."

Then after a moment's thought, the Cardinal gave expression to something which furnishes the key to the whole trouble, and discloses the real reason of the Vatican's attitude.

"It is not a question of religion," he said with great earnestness. "Mr. Roosevelt might have go to an Episcopalian or Presbyterian, or any oth church, except the Methodist, and he might ha spoken there, and yet he would have been receiv by the Pope even on the same day. But he cou not be received when it was suspected that after t audience he intended to go to the Methodist Chur in Rome, which is carrying on a most offensi campaign of calumny and detraction against t Pontiff."

The Cardinal went on to say that Mr. Roosevelt right to speak before the Methodists after the Va can audience would not have been questioned. Fu ther, Mr. Roosevelt's final message, announcing th the proposed audience was now "impossible," ha never been received from the American Embass This latter point, however, is sufficiently explain by the statement on Mr. Roosevelt's behalf th Mgr. Kennedy's second telegram practically end the matter as far as the reception was concerne but that he "had wished to keep the door open, n for his own sake, but for the sake of the Catho Church in America."

Far-Reaching Results

It should be explained that Mr. O'Laughlin w not in Rome in Mr. Roosevelt's interest, but as t representative of h Catholic co-religio ists in the Unite States.

There is litt doubt that this late incident—all t facts concernin which have bee given to the worl not by the Vatic but by Mr. Roos velt's permission, a without a syllable comment on his pa will have far-reac ing results. For t Pope to impose co ditions on any d tinguished visito from any country the world—at lea such conditions as wished to impose Fairbanks an Roosevelt—is simp medievalism. Such course would be i possible in any ci ilized court in t present day.

As a matter fact, it is understo that Mr. Roosev had not the slighte expectation of bei placed in an attitu on a public platform or before any audience Rome that would be discourteous to the Vatica All his engagements in Rome, and they were ve few, were purely official. He could place no oth construction on the Pope's imperious wishes, conveyed through Mgr. Kennedy, than that t Vatican meant to offensively emphasize its at tude towards his American compatriots, as it h done in the previous incident. To demand of Ex-President of the United States such a pled as the message implied, would be not only perso ally disrespectful, but an affront to Americans ge erally and a blow at liberty of speech and politic toleration to which no public man would submit.

Ex-President Theodore Roosevelt, Who Canceled His Reception Engagement with Pope Pius X.

Mr. Roosevelt's Statement

Shortly before leaving Naples Mr. Roosev cabled to Dr. Lyman Abbott a statement for pub cation in the Outlook, which reads as follows:

"Lyman Abbott, Editor of the Outlook.

"DEAR DR. ABBOTT: Through the Outlook I wi to make a statement to my fellow Americans regar ing what has occurred in connection with the Va can. I am sure the great majority of my fellow ci zens, Catholics quite as much as Protestants, w feel that I acted in the only way possible for American to act, and because of this very fact I mo earnestly hope that the incident will be treated in matter-of-course way as merely personal, and abo all as not warranting the slightest exhibition rancor or bitterness.

"Among my best and closest friends are ma Catholics. The respect and regard of those of n fellow Americans who are Catholics are as dear

THE CHILD WIVES OF HEATHEN INDIA

NINE years ago two American women, Mrs. C. P. Wallace and Mrs. J. M. Holmes, both of Los Angeles, Calif., having traveled rough India and investigated conditions resulting m "child marriage" in that country, decided to ke the reform of these conditions their life-work. ith that end in view an organization of American men was formed, under the title of the Indo-nerican Women's Restoration League, with Mrs. ry Garbutt, of Los Angeles, as president, and a ll board of officers. The adquarters of the league e at 3311 Temple Street, s Angeles. Shortly after ganization, Mrs. Wal-e, accompanied by Miss rrie A. Tennant, vice-esident of the league, ade a tour of this coun-y, organizing branches d circles for the work. ese devoted women la-red with remarkable en-gy and were successful arousing much interest the movement and in ding many supporters. It was next decided that ey should proceed to In-a, and organize branches the American League in at country. They also shed to enlist the sup-rt of men of power and fluence, with a view to forming the odious na-e marriage laws. They rived in India February , 1909, and the first Mar-age Reform League was ganized on December 29 the same year.

Miss Tennant has writ-n to THE CHRISTIAN RALD, telling of the re-arkable success of the ague in India. In her ter she says that the ovement has won power-l friends among the best tive people and in the press. Norendronath Sen, itor of the India Mirror, through his paper, has ceeded in arousing public interest. He was for-rly associated with his illustrious cousin, Keshub under Sen, who was instrumental in enlightening e people at the time the "age of consent" act is passed, some years ago. Mr. Norendronath is e president of the league in India, and Judge Asutosh Mookerji is vice-president. The latter is very influential throughout India and has drawn around the league many of the strongest and best men in the country. He is a judge of the High Court of Calcutta and Vice-Chancellor of the University. Miss Tennant writes of him: "His little daughter was married at the age of nine, and has been twice widowed, her last husband dying very suddenly. This cruel custom of child marriage has come very near to her father's heart and he is determined to have it abolished. She is fourteen now. Both Mr. Sen and Judge Mookerji are agreed that the marriageable age of girls should be raised to sixteen. The nobility of India have rallied around these leaders and are eager to right the wrong and reform this hideous custom. They feel very grateful to Americans for their part in this agitation."

Where the Bodies of the Dead Have Been Burned from Time Immemorial

In a statement of the objects of the crusade, issued by Judge Mookerji and Mr. Sen, it is pointed out that the custom of early marriage is contrary to the injunctions of the Shastras, and is reprehensible on physical and moral grounds. The evils arising from the system, briefly stated, are: (1) Physical degeneration; (2) increasing poverty; (3) loss of opportunities for the education of girls; (4) heavy marriage expenses; (5) early widowhood, with its attendant consequences. At an influential gathering in Calcutta it was declared by prominent speakers that the visit of the two American women was a most providential coincidence. Their work, it was explained, is not connected with any missionary propaganda, but is an independent movement, deserving of the fullest cooperation and support.

One of the speakers, Principal Kali Prasauna Bhattacharjya, said the evil of child marriage was doing incalculable mischief. It was an offense which, according to the Shastras, called for punishment. Miss Tennant has forwarded some remarkable photographs of child wives, several of which are here reproduced. Here is a native, a dhobi (washman), 35 years of age, who now has two wives. The one shown in photograph A is a child of 6 years. She wears the badge of wifehood, a streak of red paint on the forehead. This photograph was taken on February 10, 1910, in Calcutta. Photograph B is a child wife of 8 and a carpenter husband of 50 years. She also wears the red badge. C is another dhobi, aged 31, with a child wife of 7 years; he has another of 6. Both wear the red badge. D shows a little child mother of 14, with her two children. She is careworn and looks much older. She has had no training in the care of children.

It is in behalf of hundreds of thousands of poor little child wives like these that the two American ladies now in India are devoting their efforts, with the remarkable results already related.

Knowledge Here and Hereafter

TEXT—I. Cor. 13:12

"For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known."

OUR text is a strain from Paul's inimitable psalm of praise to love. By a stroke or two of inspired genius he throws his theme into high relief; compares it, analyzes it, and crowns it. He declares that knowledge is fragmentary, love complete; science limited, love infinite; theology partial, love perfect—and therefore that the perfection of human character is the perfection of love.

This word "darkly" means more than appears on its surface. It is rooted in the Greek word ainigma, and literally signifies an enigma; a dark saying, or representation, in which some known thing is concealed under obscure words or forms; therefore, the embodiment of a purpose or plan, the complete illumination of which awaits the emancipation of the human mind from "the tyranny of the instant," when all limitations shall be removed and infinite knowledge and progress shall begin.

Man's nature is so feeble and precarious! Whence came he? Whither is he going? What is the meaning of life, the interpretation of death? We stand, as it were, upon the shore of a mighty ocean, anxiously scanning the horizon, but seeing only a waste of water, hearing only the sullen boom of the angry surf, which rolls on and on forever! What is a man? Must we not answer with Victor Hugo? "That infirmity, that shadow, that atom, that grain of sand, that drop of water, that tear fallen from the eyes of destiny, so weak, so uncertain, so ignorant, and so restless; who goes on in trouble and in doubt, trembling if he looks before him, sad if he looks behind him; who at certain hours bends down with a sort of sacred horror beneath the forces of nature, under the sound of the sea, under the shivering of the trees, under the shadow of the mountains, under the beaming of the stars; who cannot raise his head without being blinded by the light, by night without being crushed by the darkness!" Yes, this is man; and, with such limitations, it is not altogether against him that he sees darkly.

Finding Out the Almighty

But there are those who proceed upon an entirely different basis. They postulate the possibility of a perfect knowledge of the universe, that theology can be laid bare to the core, infinity be reduced to a science, and vivisection be performed on the Almighty. This knowledge is classified as "systematic theology," and the Bible is cited as its textbook; but the Bible encourages no such assumption. It enters into no technical analysis of the divine attributes, makes no attempt to map out the infinite, nor to lift the veil of the eternal. To the contrary, it rebukes the bold ambition that would scale the battlements of the supernatural or seek to annex the throne of God to the domain of scientific knowledge! "Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?"

Why is it that the explorer, the man of science, the astute discoverer, has brought back no tidings of God? Why, when science and philosophy have advanced triumphantly to the drum-beat of progress, has the knowledge of God retreated, compelling the apostles of worldly wisdom to confess their ignorance in the very name they have given the divine Being, "the Unknown"? Have these men been utterly wanting in earnestness and sincerity? No! We would not so harshly judge them. They have been sincere seekers of truth. With bleeding hands and lacerated feet they have felt and groped in the darkness if peradventure they might catch the day-spring of eternal hope! They have swept the golden dust of the sky with their glasses and discovered worlds; they have torn open the crust of the earth and explored by-gone ages; they have made the universe tributary to their conquests and fondly hoped, in like manner, to storm the abode of the Almighty. But all in vain their presumption. The Infinite cannot be explored or discovered by man's boldest conceit. No aspiring Columbus can track the boundless continent of his abode. No adventurous Franklin can experiment with the dynamic forces that encircle his throne. How then is he to be known? Once and once only is it recorded that our Lord, usually a "man of sorrows," "rejoiced with exceeding joy."

And what was the occasion of that extraordinary soul rapture? Listen to his own explanation: "I thank thee, Father, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent and hast revealed them unto babes and sucklings." And the meaning of this declaration is simply this: that spiritual truth must be spiritually discerned. The brain is not the organ with which to lay hold upon God, any more than you can see a picture with your ears, or hear music with your eyes. You cannot weigh truth in scales, nor measure love with a yardstick, nor demonstrate Christian truth with a syllogism. You cannot discover God as you discover an asteroid, or a new principle of mathematics, or a new law in sociology. Supernatural things must be supernaturally discerned. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit."

What Christianity Reveals

Because Christianity is a system of revelation, rather than demonstration, rationalism pronounces it false. If it can be shown, however, that the intent of revelation is so involved in mystery that man, toward whom it is directed, cannot possibly understand it, then the objection is sustained. But what it professes to reveal is clear to every intelligent mind: it reveals facts so related to the infinite as to render the modes of their existence mysterious, but the facts are none the less clear. The mind cannot originate an idea transcending its own power, neither can it entertain such an idea. Could it but do so, then effect would be greater than cause, and instead of mystery there would be an absurdity. Christianity is not an absurdity, because it violates no law of reason. It is a mystery, on account of its magnitude and the relation it sustains to the supernatural. The mysteries of revealed religion are the mysteries of modes, not of facts. The revelations of revealed religion are the revelation of facts, not of modes. These facts are sufficient. They shine like fixed stars in the firmament, tower like massive peaks out of the mountain range, stand like rugged columns, upholding the vast superstructure of Christian faith. We may not be able to interpret the language of the stars, but their radiance illumines the darkness and saves us from stumbling; ours may not be the ability to measure, or weigh, or calculate, or climb those dizzy summits, but their greatness is our defense, their hidden treasures our wealth, and their living waters our strength and salvation; we cannot lift those massive columns or understand the mystery of their power, but we may behold their strength and beauty, feel their security, rejoice beneath the encircling arch of redemption, gaze into the star-lit dome of Providence, and live and love and labor within the glorious temple of a blood-bought and regenerate humanity.

Thus we see that the facts abide. They meet the necessities of the case. They tower from earth to heaven, measuring moral distances and altitudes, pointing the way of duty and destiny, outlining along the world's spiritual horizon the perfection of the divine plan and inviting to enrapturing visions of God and his unspeakable glory! Passing beyond these peaks, we are out in starless night, blinded by the mists and mystery of life, roving about over a trackless waste without a torch or guide, lost amid the vastitudes of the infinite. But, returning to the facts, we find a rational basis for the universe, cause for all effect, purpose in all phenomena, providence in all power, love in all law, pardon for all transgression, healing balm for all woe, and abundant life for all death. From this viewpoint the universe flames with light! We are no longer "an infant crying in the night, an infant crying for the light, with no language but a cry." We are the children of a King, inheritors of the divine glory, heirs apparent to the throne of God!

And this brings us to the second proposition of the text, viz., that by and by we shall have a more thorough, satisfactory knowledge of God and his universe. Glorious revelation! Not always shall we be found tugging at the dark problem of life and crying, "Oh, who will pluck the heart out of this mystery?" Not always shall we grope, half blindly, after truth and just touch with our finger-tip the boundary line of life. Not forever shall we be in bondage to the weakness of the body, hampered by its liability to disease and hindered by its proneness to fatigue. Our natures are God-given. Our powers are patterned after his. Our longings, strugles and anticipations are from above, and God c- not forever disappoint them. By and by the da- ness of this world shall give place to the light f heaven, and the mysteries which have baffled us sl grow dimmer, while the divine realities shall - vance from the dispelling gloom and grow brigh . In the bosom of such a destiny, surrounded by e vast tomes of the library of heaven, we will sea h after knowledge and find subjects of study forev ; we will converse with cherubim, be instructed y angels, listen to the disquisitions of sages, and t down at the feet of the crowned Christ. Wha a chain of progression, commencing where we le n our first letter, till, dropping the rudiments d leaving the elementary principles, we take our f t lessons in the university of heaven, eternity e period of our tutelage, graduation never.

Then we will know more about creation. Myri s of systems may lie just beyond the galaxy, and e know it not. Then we will walk those burning o s, and, with deeper knowledge of creation, we s ll praise God in the language of other spheres. e will know more about ourselves, of our powers d capacities, and of the mode by which we operate e senses. Yes, and we shall know more of our fa- ties and powers, more of the relation between e spiritual and material, and their relation to God d universal Being. We will know more about rede- tion, its history, developments, triumphs and - summation; more about Christ, his nature, love, d work, his incarnation, humiliation, sacrifice, de- , resurrection, ascension, mediation, and intercess n.

What We Shall Know Hereafter

We will know more about Providence. We wil o longer be perplexed with the rapid movements f flying cherubim, confounded with the roar and - tricate movements of compounded wheels; h whirlwinds, clouds, fire and darkness, with shatt d plans and broken hearts. Then we will know e reason of our bereavements, the cause of our di p- pointments, the meaning of our sufferings. d may tell us, or sainted loved ones may lead us y the hand to the great Teacher, and from his lips e will learn the explanation of the sorrows thro h which we have passed. We will know more ab t heaven. Bible story is mostly in the negative o sickness there, no sorrow there, no sin there o tears there, no night there. Then there are s e positive statements: white robes—that means r- ity; palm branches—that means victory; tw e manner of fruit—that means endless variety; tw e gates—that means boundless hospitality; yes, e will know more about heaven, and then that d question, "Shall we know each other there?" wi e settled, for we "shall know even as we are kno n."

During the Civil War there entered into on f the recruiting camps in southern Illinois, one af r- noon, an old drummer, gray and bowed and bro n, and he had a little drum hanging to his belt. d he threw the drumsticks in the air and turned t m over and over with such rhythm of effect that fir ly some of the soldier boys gathered about him, and e of them said, "Let us bring the old fifer and l e some music"; and soon the old fifer was there, d they were introduced, and started to play some r- tial music, when, after playing a few strains, e drumsticks of the drummer fell to the ground, d with one hand he pushed back the cap of the er and with the other he rubbed his own eyes, and r a few moments he gazed into the eyes of the er and then he exclaimed, "John, John, didn't you y that at Lundy's Lane, just as the sun went down e night we charged the British? I drummed i by your side!" And the fife of the fifer fell upon e drumsticks of the drummer, and the two old en were in each other's arms, weeping, swaying d rejoicing, for they were boys again. Nearly y years had pecked and hacked at them. They re scarred and worn and wan, but there was somet g in the music that brought back the association of former years, and they knew each other.

So, it seems to me, when the battle of this li is ended and we push up into the city of God, and k about for our loved ones, there will be somethin in the old songs of the fireside or the sanctuary, s e- thing in the little modes of speech or in the met ds of movement, something that will come back t us and we shall "know even as we are known."

In Memoriam

A MIGHTY man is taken—
A worker strong and brave—
And loving hearts by thousands
Bow at his new-made grave.
Ever ready for action;
Alert to all calls of need;
Regardless of race or station,
Regardless of faith or creed.
Thousands have blessed his kindness,
Millions have sung his praise;
He was the people's gallant knight
In strenuous, busy days.
The world will be the loser;
A gainer great is he;
For now the King in his beauty
He can both know and see.

ow Roosevelt Helped a Mission

OD'S way of weaving events into f the wonderful web of his purpose as strikingly illustrated some time o on the field of the Africa Inland ssion. A prayer of years for per- ssion to enter the Belgian Congo ter- ory was answered during the ap- arance of Ex-President Roosevelt in st Africa on his hunting trip. quiring if he could do the Africa land Mission a service, he was in- med of the desire to plant stations the Belgian Congo. With unhesi- ing zeal he at once used his influence secure this long-coveted grant.

This called for workers and for the ening of the way. Special prayer s poured out for these two things. letter from the United States came this time, from a young man who d decided to go into the Congo re- n to labor. Strangely enough, he d even picked out the very tribe ong whom he wished to labor, and s tribe was one which our mission- es were especially praying for.

About the time, Field Director Hurl- rt and Mr. John W. Stauffacher re making a voyage of exploration a Lake Victoria steamer. They re wondering how they could secure ch needed information about the ngo region when the boat stopped to e on hides at Bukoba. Here a anger came aboard. Though his ard was ragged and his appearance inted to a long sojourn in the wild erior, something in his face indi- ed the scholar. He turned out to be Russian Polander, in the employ of a rlin anthropological society. He d been studying the people of the le and Congo basins, and was re- rning home from the very midst of e tribes to which the Mission was xious to carry the Gospel.

The traveler was willing to share his ets with the missionaries, and rned over for their use a vast fund information. The afternoon was nt in copying maps and in learning e "sign of the unblazed way."

There are twelve young volunteers the Africa Inland Mission field. ree of these are already on the At- tic, with their faces turned toward e Dark Continent. Nine others are ll waiting for the way to open to rry the Gospel to those far interior bes. Some reader of this incident y wish to have a part in the wonder- l purpose-weaving of God by pray- g that these laborers may be speedily t forth.

While on safari through parts of rman East Africa recently, Mr. rlburt was struck with the fact that llions here were without the Gospel, whole generation after Livingston d passed that way.

THE LITTLE BROWN BED

By Rev. J. M. FARRAR, D.D.*

WHEN a flower begins to droop and hang its head it is getting sleepy. How snugly it rolls itself up in a little brown bed you call a seed. "As snug as a bug in a rug," the flower sleeps all winter. What you call "spring," the season after winter, is "Mother Nature" going from bed to bed to wake her little flower friends. She lifts the shades of winter and lets in the light. If they do not wake, she sprinkles rain on them. Some are easy to wake, and they get right up; others are very sleepy, and dear old spring has to be very patient. Sound asleep, but way down in the seed is life, and it hears the call. They sleep, but the seed-heart waketh. Some one whose name I do not know, a friend of "Mother Spring," says:—

FAR down in Mother Earth a tiny seed was sleeping, safely wrapped in a warm bed. The little seed had been asleep for a long time, and now some one thought it was time for the seed to wake up. This some one was an earthworm, that lived close by. When the worm saw this little seed still sleeping he cried: "Oh, you lazy fellow, wake up! Your little friends are awake and you have slept long enough."

"But how can I grow or move at all in this tight, brown sleeping-gown?" said the seed, in a drowsy tone.

"Why, push it off; that's the way the other seeds have done."

"Oh, dear! Oh, dear!" said the seed. "What shall I do? I am so sleepy I can't keep awake any longer," and he fell asleep again.

AT last he awoke, and found Mother Spring throwing water in his face. Then he felt so warm and happy that he cried: "I really believe I am going to grow after all. Who woke me up and helped me out of bed?"

"I woke you," said a soft voice close by. "I am a sunbeam. Mother Spring sent me to wake you, and my friends, the raindrops, washed the sleep out of your eyes."

"Oh, thank you," said the seed; "you're all very kind. Will you help me to grow into a plant, too?"

"Yes," said the sunbeam, "I'll come as often as I can to help you; and the raindrops will come, too. If you work hard, with our help, you will become a beautiful plant, I'm sure."

"But," said the seed, "how did you know that I was sleeping here? Could you see me?"

"No," said the sunbeam, "but Mother Spring saw you. She called the raindrops to her and said: 'One of my seed-children is sleeping down there. Go down and help him, and tell the sunbeam to follow you, so that the seed may begin to grow.'"

"How kind she is," said the seed; "if she had not seen me sleeping here I should have slept on, and on, and on, slept forever in my little brown bed. How did Mother Spring know I was here?"

"She is a servant of God, who knows all things."

"How can I thank him?" said the seed. "What can I do that will please him very much?"

"Grow into the best plant that you possibly can," said the sunbeam; "that will please God most of all."

SO the seed grew into a beautiful vine. He climbed higher and higher toward the heavens, from which the Father smiled down upon him to reward his labor.

There is some one more beautiful and valuable than a flower, that droops after a long day and wants to sleep. Some one who needs sleep more than the seed needs it, and who says, "Rock me to sleep, mother, rock me to sleep." This some one is a little child.

Before going to sleep you should say, "In the morning wake me from sleep, mother, wake me from sleep." How often you would be late for breakfast, late for school, late for church, if mother did not wake you.

What part of you wakes up the rest of you when mother calls? It is the part that keeps on thinking while you sleep. What does our text say? "I sleep, but my heart waketh." It is that part that will never sleep. What we call death the Bible calls sleep. There is a beautiful story in the Gospel by Matthew. You will find it in the ninth chapter. A man came to Christ and told him that his dear little girl was dead. Christ went home with the father, and when he saw the little girl he said, "She is not dead, but sleepeth." The people laughed at Christ, and told him the little girl was dead. Christ just woke her up, took her by the hand, and she arose. She was only asleep. The word "cemetery" means sleeping place. As Mother Spring wakes the seed, and your mother wakes you, so our greatest friend, Christ, will some day wake all who sleep, all who are called dead. Listen! "My beloved spake, and said unto me, Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away; for lo! the winter is past, the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land; the fig tree putteth forth her green figs, and the vines with the tender grape give a good smell. Arise, my love, my fair one, and come away."

Would it not be splendid to write on the tomb, "I sleep, but my heart waketh."

* Pastor First Reformed Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. TEXT: "I sleep, but my heart waketh." Solomon's Song 5:2.

The Little Woman

ONE of the Little Women, she came up to Heaven's gate;
And seeing the throng was pressing, she signed that she fain would wait.
"For I was not great nor noble," she said, "I was poor and plain;
And should I go boldly forward, I know it would be in vain."

She sat near the shining portal, and looked at the surging crowd
Of them that were kings and princes, of them that were rich and proud;
And sudden she trembled greatly, for one with a brow like flame
Came to her, and hailed her gladly, and spoke to her her name:

"Come, enter the jeweled gateway," he said, "for the prize is thine;
The work that in life you rendered was work that was fair and fine;
So come, while the rest stand waiting, and enter in here and now—
A crown of the life eternal is waiting to press thy brow."

Then trembled the Little Woman, and cried: "It may not be I!
Here wait they that wrought with greatness, so how may I pass them by?
I carved me no wondrous statues, I painted no wondrous things,
I spoke no tremendous sayings that rang in the ears of kings;

"I toiled in my little cottage, I spun and I baked and swept;
I sewed and I patched and mended—oh, lowly the house I kept!
I sang to my little children, I led them in worthy ways,
And so I might not grow famous, I knew nought but care-bound days.

"So was it by night and morning, so was it by week and year;
I worked with my weary fingers through days that were bright and drear;
And I have grown old and wrinkled, and I have grown gray and bent;
I ask not for ehants of glory, now that I have found content."

"Arise!" cried the waiting angel. "Come first of the ones that wait,
For you are the voices singing, for you do we ope the gate;
So great as has been thy labor, so great shall be thy reward!"
Then he gave the Little Woman the glory of the Lord.

Sure Cure for the Blues

Dear Editor: THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, next to the Word of God, is the best reading I have. In Christian teaching it is strictly orthodox, eliminating from its creed all the non-essentials of salvation; still, in no case advocating a careless, "free and easy" Christian life. While not fanatical, it is eminently practical, logical and sincere. It comes to my bedside an evangel of light, life and inspiration. A sure cure for the blues.

Is Woman the Cause of High Prices?

American Wives and Mothers Defend Themselves Against Professor Patten's Ungallant Charge

Are Women Responsible?

THE assertion of Professor Patten, of the University of Pennsylvania, that the extravagance of women is one of the main factors in the recent increase in the cost of living has aroused deep interest among our readers, whose opinions on the subject we invited. The letters received from them have been amply worth printing in full. We regret that the limitations of our space prevent us from using more than brief extracts from them. Both sides are well presented.

PROFESSOR PATTEN'S CHARGE

PROFESSOR PATTEN, who fills the Chair of Political Economy in the University of Pennsylvania, believes that the increased cost of living arises largely from the new status of woman, who is no longer a creator of industry in the home, but purchases nearly everything outside; does not practise thrift, and becomes "often its chief burden." We give the other side to-day.

Women Dress Too Well

I think Professor Patten is right. Parents are groaning over the extravagance of their daughters—their hats, gloves and shoes—all to match. And the hats are such expensive monstrosities! Then women gad about too much. They buy food instead of cooking it at home, and drink too much soda water. Oh for the good old-fashioned mother, who knew how to make bread the sight of which made you hungry! Young men everywhere hesitate to marry the extravagant girls of the present day.

What Two Women Did

I want to tell Dr. Patten about two women in our village, who are only types of thousands. A penniless young couple came to live here, the wife a brave girl, expert with her needle. They had two children. She did all the housework, and trained them up to be good Christians. The boy went to college. Some said, "Presposterous!" But he graduated with honor and is now a successful business man. "For years I never had a new dress," his mother said, "but what do I care, now that my boy has won?"

Another couple came to town. The father was a victim to "the worm of the still." Soon he disappeared, leaving his young wife penniless with five small children. She set bravely to work to support them. Everybody admired her spirit and tried to help her. She kept them all in comfort until, one by one, they became bread-winners. No family is more respected in the community than this. I have lived more than four-score years, and this is the sort of women I have seen oftenest.

Mt. Upton, N. Y. R.

Women Not Extravagant

Why should women spin and weave at home when they can buy good cloth at a less price than it would cost to raise the flax and wool, card, spin and weave it? Why should men have their clothes made by the village tailoress, as of old? Or their shoes made by the itinerant shoemaker? It would be absurd. Professor Patten says: "The essential conditions of home life cannot be neglected without bringing prosperity to a standstill." But was all this hard labor of women an "essential condition"? Some of us can recall the haggard, exhausted condition in which our mothers were seen when we came home from school every day, and the pang which shot through our childish hearts as we thought that life somehow ought to be made easier for the mothers. In the great mass of American homes the baking, preserving and dressmaking still go on, and our women take as great pride as ever in good housekeeping and ingenious dressmaking.

"Do their own washing and ironing"

I have grown-up sons and daughters, and I have traveled extensively, and my observation is that a woman generally values a dollar more than a man does and makes it count for more than her brother. Not long ago a young college tutor married. He found that he and his wife could live well on what he formerly spent alone, owing to his wife's management.

One of my grown-up sons said: "Professor Patten isn't acquainted with the women of his town, or else he would see that they are the backbone of the community. In their homes, in the churches and the philanthropies they carry more than their share." The lawyer of the family remarked: "It is the man of the family who is oftener the chief burden than the woman."

Why is it that when prices are high business is lively and everybody is prosperous, and when things are cheap business is dull?

Ardent love for home, husband and children and fervent desire to be of use to them are the characteristics of the vast majority of our women. Many of the criticisms passed upon them sound like Adam's "The woman thou gavest me, she did it."

Women Are Saving

Professor Patten's accusation is unjust. The great majority of women make the clothing of their families, and two-thirds of them do their own washing and ironing. We save every crumb of bread, and make it into savory dishes. Many of these hard-working women are not illiterate. They are college graduates, trying hard to save in order that their husbands may have money to spend at barber shops and at the tailor's.

MRS. MYRON SMITH.

Women Are to Blame

Many women expect their husbands, even if they are not rich, to pet them and shower gifts on them. When they spend, it is likely to be in "dribs," so they do not realize that they are, on the whole, spending a great deal. "A woman can throw out at the back door with a spoon faster than a man can throw in at the front door with a shovel." A lady said lately she would get her shirtwaist made outside, as it cost only a dollar. She had a machine, the ability and the time, but she did not wish to apply herself, though that dollar was needed in her family.

Then the running of bills is a source of extravagance. Better pay as we go, and do without if we cannot pay. "Man's worth is measured by his capacity to do without." Woman must arouse herself and put her shoulder to the wheel, or else the question of hard times will remain unsolved.

"If the housemother would go to market"

A Dairymaid's View

Many times men are to blame for the shortage of money in the family. After the women have worked hard to save, the men take the money and invest it in some foolish enterprise.

We farmers are largely responsible for the increased cost of living. Wind and weather, diseases of our stock and mismanagement of our crops have greatly limited our production. Then many farmers have found that tobacco pays better than other crops, and so less grain has been raised. The demand from foreign countries, too, has been so great that we have exported, perhaps, too much. The pressure upon us has been so great that we are selling hogs that are not sufficiently larded, and veal and beef that are not in fit condition to leave the barnyard. We are hoping for large crops after this snowy winter.

"We farmers are largely responsible"

Farm Products Decreasing

The price of hogs two years ago was very low. The farmer thought he had better sell his grain instead of feeding it to hogs at such prices. Therefore fewer hogs were raised, and we are feeling the reaction. Land is high; teams and labor are scarce and high. If we had more help we could produce more provisions. Now many cornstalks are left standing because of lack of help to cut them. They might be fed to stock, which would mean more milk, butter and cheese. We could raise more fruit and grain if we could get more help. The women are not to blame.

SUFFRAGISTS MEET IN WASHINGTON

PRESIDENT TAFT welcomes the women suffragists from all over the United States, who gather in annual convention at Washington n April 14. The President's address occurs on the pening night of the meeting and marks a new era n the history of women suffrage conventions, which ave never before had a President of the United States on their platform.

A special feature of the convention, also, is the resentation to Congress of the great petition of ver one million signatures, asking that the ballot be iven to women. Many distinguished names appear mong these petitioners, representing leaders in hurch, education, the professions, trades and indus- ries. Michigan alone has supplied 60,000 names.

Just before the petition is presented the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives and the Woman Suffrage Committee of the Senate will grant earings on a bill providing for a sixteenth amend- ent to the Constitution, enfranchising women. his amendment was introduced by Senator Borah n February 22. Among those who favor it is Sen- tor Robert L. Owen of Oklahoma, who is one of the hief speakers for the convention. Another prom- nent speaker is Professor Max Eastman, of Colum- ia University, official organizer of the "Voters' eague for Woman Suffrage," composed of men champions and supporters of the movement, headed by George Foster Peabody, president, and Mr. Dean Howells, Congressman Herbert Parsons, Professor Nathaniel Schmidt of Cornell, Rev. John P. Peters, Rabbi Wise, William Jay Schieffelin, John Mitchell,

Mrs. Ella L. Stewart

Mrs. Rachel F. Avery

Z. R. Brockway, Oscar Garrison Villard, and many others.

This active men's league is one of the novel forms of organized workers for women's enfranchisement, which have marked the development of the suffrage cause during the year. Organization has been the keynote and it has been vigorously promoted in a variety of ways. One of these is the movement for special societies of self-supporting women, groups representing the professional women as well as those in shops, offices and various vocations. Women's suffrage unions of this class have been formed both in New York City and in Philadelphia.

The year has been marked by a large accession to the National College Equal Suffrage League, 1,309 new members having been added during the year.

The women of Michigan have voted on all questions of local taxation during the year, and the women of Easton, Md., owning $500 worth of property, found their request for the vote on municipal questions favorably received by the city council. A strenuous campaign for the enfranchisement of women has been waged in South Dakota.

The establishment of national headquarters in New York City has been another noteworthy feature of the year's work. The national offices are now at 505 Fifth Avenue, and form a Mecca not only for American workers, but a rallying point for women suffragists from all lands. J. A. S.

THE PASSING OF KING MENELEK

IT was a stern old fighting king, of the type we associate with the Middle Ages rather than with the twentieth century, that ceased to rule when Menelek of Abyssinia laid down his sword and sceptre and his people were called to transfer their allegiance to the Crown Prince, Lidj Jeassu, his little grandson. Menelek, king of kings of Ethiopia, as he proudly called himself, was one of the very few rulers of African States who were able to maintain their independence in the face of armed European aggression. The Abyssinians have been dreading the day when it would become known that this reputed descendant of King Solomon was dead, for the land-hungry countries of Europe have long cast covetous eyes on the widespread domain which acknowledged his authority, and they felt that as long as Menelek ruled they would be free to live their lives in their own way, without outside interference.

It was reported several weeks ago that Menelek was critically ill and that the subordinate chiefs or kings of Abyssinia, of which there are several, had agreed that Ras Tesama, the leading statesman of the country, should be appointed regent to preserve the interests of the Crown Prince, who is but a very small boy. Menelek at this writing is critically ill and may be laid with his ancestors before this strikes the eye of the reader.

Menelek was known to his people, among his other titles, as "the Lion of Judah." He took great pride in the tradition that he was a direct descendant of King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba. His queen, Taitou, was his cousin and also claimed descent from the Queen of Sheba. The kingdom is one of the oldest in existence to-day, having a fairly authentic history, aside from the legends, back to the time of Christ. The religion of the country for centuries has been a form of Christianity, its church being under the authority of a Coptic archbishop.

Those who thought of Menelek as an ordinary African chief were greatly surprised when they were brought face to face with this despotic ruler of nearly ten millions of people. They then found, as many a European statesman and diplomat and soldier had found, that he was one of the most remarkable men who have ever held sway over any country south of the Mediterranean; that he was skilled in statecraft and diplomacy, while in military science he had outmatched any general who has been sent against him. They saw a powerful and shrewd face, with strongly-marked Semitic features, with eyes ever on the alert to catch the least motion of those who were in conversation with him while careful of expressing his own emotions and thoughts. Ordinarily his dress was of the simplest description, and would be regarded with disdain by a European farm-hand—a pair of cotton trousers and a cotton shirt, covered with a light cloak, wound around the upper part of the body, on his head a wide-brimmed hat.

The Late King Menelek

On state occasions he made quite a different figure. He wore a magnificently embroidered robe and a crown, which resembled in its general contour the tiara of the Roman Pontiff. There was a glint of jewels, which would have excited the envy of the most fashionable woman in Paris or Berlin. He was a great stickler for ceremony, and there was a rigidly prescribed court etiquette. His guards were numerous and fairly well drilled, and in addition there was a numerous retinue of servants and attendants, especially umbrella-bearers, for the sun has an especial fondness, it would seem, for Abyssinia.

Menelek took, as did his predecessors, an especial interest in military matters, and learned all he could from Europeans, and then used the information to keep them out of the country and from acquiring in various ways slices of his territory. There is no uniformity of costume in this odd army. Each man dresses as he pleases or in what he can get, and a drill instructor from Berlin would raise his hands in horror at the way in which they execute some of their evolutions; but when it comes to determined and gallant fighting there have been no better soldiers south of the Mediterranean since Hannibal and his followers made inroads on the military supremacy of Rome and trailed in the dust the eagles of the Roman legions. The profession of arms is greatly esteemed, while trade and commerce have been looked down upon. While this has preserved the independence of the country, it has also kept it in a backward state. Of course, there are several African strains in this military population, but the dominant race is strongly Semitic. In time of need Menelek could lead to battle 150,000 men, well armed with modern weapons. At Adowa, in 1896, they defeated the Italians, the invaders losing 7,000 men, terminating the war. Now that another rules, there may be other attempts on some part of Abyssinia's 200,000 square miles of territory, with consequences that the wisest statesman could only guess at. R. S. B.

Roosevelt Advises the Egyptians

WITH the same characteristically impulsive courage that has marked his course in politics and his career in the African jungle, Ex-President Roosevelt has been telling some wholesome, if not wholly appreciated, truths to the people of Egypt. In an address before a distinguished gathering in Cairo University he told his auditors that the Egyptians, who had lately assassinated one of their leading statesmen, would not be fitted for nationality until several generations had passed away and had demonstrated their qualifications for self-government. Such a speech, in a Mohammedan institution almost a thousand years old, and honeycombed with the spirit of revolt, was unprecedented. It incensed many of his hearers; yet the audience, by the very earnestness and truthfulness of the strong, fiery American, was won over from its attitude of antagonism and applauded vociferously. Something more was needed, he told them bluntly, than mere intelligence; men must have courage, decency, morality, manliness, self-respect. The development of a people must be on substantial and enduring lines, and, above all, lawlessness, racial hatred, envy and violence should be sternly discountenanced. He denounced the recent assassination in burning words that consternated his hearers, even while exciting their admiration for the speaker's fearlessness and love of the truth. Egypt has been under alien domination for many centuries. It was once the world's intellectual centre, and its opportunity may come again. Mr. Roosevelt, though he has infuriated the Egyptian people and press by his fierce criticism of nationalism—which they heard with surprise from a citizen of the great Western republic—has nevertheless told some wholesome truths, to which they would do well to give heed. Egypt might pay too dear a price for freedom, if emancipation from British rule were to be followed by a new bondage, beside which the present control would seem beneficent.

The Sin of Bribery

BRIBERY is our national sin. For the past month the whole country has been shocked at the revelations of wholesale bribery in two States. In New York, a legislative investigation has brought shame and indignation to the Senate. One member, a bribe-taker, has been driven into disgraceful oblivion, where he may be followed by others. Lobbyists and legislators, insurance directors and officers of other corporations are entangled in the web of accusation. Honored names have been blackened, and men who once stood high in public estimation are now named only with contempt. In Pittsburg, Pa., a condition of affairs has been disclosed that brings up shameful memories of the Tweed ring, the Credit Mobilier and the notorious Broadway franchise steal. By the confession of a bribery agent—who was taking his revenge upon his accomplices for refusing to support his family while he lay in jail—one of the most gigantic frauds in recent criminal history was laid bare. Eighty persons were involved. Some of them were well-known bankers, men of means, whom the world had regarded as citizens of unimpeachable honor and integrity; yet so eager were they to have the handling of the city funds that they bribed the members of the Common Council by wholesale. They believed they could keep their crime a secret; but for months before the final explosion came they were like hunted men, living in hourly terror of exposure. When the blow fell, they saw how shallow had been their hope of escaping detection. They had themselves woven the net in which they were caught. Then followed the frenzied rush to make confession in order to avert punishment. Some of the councilmen groveled on their knees before the judge, pleading for mercy. One day ten, another day twenty-four confessed. Fifty-nine bank directors, representing hundreds of millions in wealth, some of them members of great corporations, are implicated in this black tale of graft.

How are we to regard the crimes of these men of wealth and education? Their offense, whatever it may be in the eyes of the law, is morally worse than that of the poor wretch who filches a pocketbook or plunders a house. The vulgar thief who steals a few dollars, or the starving man who snatches a loaf of bread, is prosecuted vigorously and receives swift punishment, while the rich criminal too often goes unwhipped of justice, although guilty of far graver offenses.

With the appalling evidence before us of the increase of graft on all sides, it becomes a vital question how this great national crime, which threatens to destroy the moral fibre of our people, is to be controlled. It is trite to say that we need severer laws to punish such offenses, and equally so to urge that we must raise the standard of morals among our public men, whether they serve in banks, corporations or legislative bodies. That old sin of covetousness, the love of money, is at the root of it all. We have so commercialized our lives that wealth, not character, is now the universal goal of effort. Bribery is one of the easiest and quickest ways of gratifying this desire. There is to-day no legislature without its lobby and no lobby without its victims. But a day comes when the wickedness done in secret is laid bare to the world. Then the price is paid in shame and degradation, not only for the actual perpetrators, but for their relatives. The only man who can view undismayed such scenes as those enacted at Albany and Pittsburg is he who has walked uprightly in the fear of God and who has kept his honor clean and his hands free from bribes. Such a man may be poor in purse yet rich in character and strong in heart, fearing neither accusation nor exposure. But the man "whose right hand is full of bribes," who "taketh a gift to pervert the ways of judgment," who "doeth evil with both hands" is under special condemnation and leaves a legacy of shame to posterity.

Women Reply to Professor Patten

RESPONDING to our invitation, many bright American women have taken up the task of defending their sex against the ungallant attack of Professor Patten, of the University of Pennsylvania. It will be remembered that the substance of the accusation, that American women are mainly responsible for the present high cost of living, was published recently in these columns. The answers received, and which appear in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, are so evidently spontaneous and so exceedingly clever, that it is hard to dissect and curtail them. The consensus of opinion among our readers is that women, extravagant though some of them may be, are not chiefly to blame for the high prices of the necessaries of life. Probably, as several of the writers suggest, the return to the soil is the one course that is essential to the restoration of the normal balance of affairs.

Philosophers have told us that the supply of servants is steadily decreasing, so that men will more surely serve themselves, which will be far better for the race. The great rush for the cities has left the farms poorly tended. Men still eat as much as ever, but the number producing food has been, proportionally, greatly lessened. If the present stress will only force many from the over-crowded cities back to the peace and healthful labor of the farms it will be most useful. One man can easily raise on a small farm enough to support and educate an average family. It is largely sheer cockneyism—the silly pride of living in a city—which has so gathered our people into the great centres. This desire is closely connected with that love of dress and lavishness of expense to which several of our correspondents allude. These capable and observant women hold that, if there were a movement back to the land, the supply and demand of food would regulate itself and a more sane and wholesome temper would pervade all of our modern life.

Crime and Its Protection

NO crime in recent years has so deeply stirred New York and the country as the dreadful murder of Ruth Wheeler, the young stenographer, who, all innocent and unsuspecting, while going to what she believed was to be her first position, walked into a death-trap. She was the victim of a criminal system which could only flourish under a corrupt and careless municipal government, for her slayer was of the type of youth who make the odious "white slave traffic" a business. Although the new administration, under Mayor Gaynor, is doing much to purify the morals of municipal politics, there ar many dark corners in the Augean Stable yet to l cleansed. To stamp out this odious traffic wou alone be sufficient to immortalize any New Yo City administration.

Ruth Wheeler's pitiful story is already well know and need not be repeated here. We have before u a list of a dozen other young girls, all strangely mis ing in the last two years—swallowed up by the gre devouring metropolis, which exacts its annual tril ute of the best and the fairest. How many of the may have been trapped and done to death, as Rut Wheeler was trapped, no one may ever discove The disgrace and responsibility for such crimes, ar for the conditions that make them possible, must l laid at the door of those who, while they had th power, basely neglected to use it in the interest public morality and for the suppression of crimes this character, which have been growing so star lingly of late years.

The Rockefeller Charter

ALL is not smooth sailing for the Rockefelle Foundation. John Bigelow, the nonogenaria publicist, sounds the alarm, declaring that such charter as Mr. Rockefeller and his associates see "will create a new power that will be a rival to ou Federal Government itself." He adds that it woul confer more "than all the power that has ever bee conferred by its Constitution on our Federal Go ernment." He fears that "the vox populi migh under such an influence, cease to be the vox Dei. Another critic apprehends that so vast an incorpo ated body, with a permanent existence, would posses an influence dangerously antagonistic to the soci and democratic character of our republic. Mos serious of all is the charge that an organization c unlimited means and scope would ultimately becom "a monopoly of benevolence, and would transfor society into an organization of suppliants."

We do not see any real reason for such apprehe sions. Mr. Rockefeller is the possessor of a giganti fortune, which he is turning over to trustees to b utilized for general welfare. Wisely administere it is capable of doing great good on an extensiv scale; but the suggestion that it would pauperize th nation is far from being warranted by anything i the outlined programme of the Foundation.

There is a great deal of indiscriminate charity an unorganized benevolence which, lacking system an thoroughness, does more harm than good; but it i clearly not the purpose of the Foundation and it managers to monopolize the eleemosynary field, o by a too lavish generosity to put a premium upo idleness and incompetency, but rather to make th Foundation a powerful factor for education, th development of industry, social betterment, genera enlightenment and whatever goes to make the con ditions of human life happier. We hope to see th charter passed.

Mount Etna's Activity

MOUNT ETNA, a hundred miles in circumference at its base, reaching an altitude of over ten thousand feet, only a little less famous as volcano than Vesuvius, has been belching out its e, smoke and melted lava, destroying fields and inging terror to the inhabitants of the villages of e eastern border of Sicily. Twelve new craters ened on Mount Etna, between Monte Faggio and na, and the streams of liquid fire united at the se in a river of lava that brought panic to the inbitants of that region. This flow of lava is said be more profuse than the one in 1892. On the her hand, tens of thousands of people, visiting that rtion of Italy, hurried to the neighborhood of the ene that they might witness the sublime eruptions the mountain. Although many trees, vineyards, chards and houses were destroyed, the movement the lava flow was so slow that up to the present ne the people have been enabled to escape with eir lives. Disastrous as the present eruption has en, there may yet be the earthquake or loss of life, t the civilized world will pray that such a calamity ay be averted. Its damage does not compare with ose of 1169, 1669, 1792 or 1879. The activity of e volcano is produced by the energy of the lmighty, who piled the moun in, dug out its craters, kined the fires within, and inted the flowers of the garns, and germinated the seed the fields that adorn its surce. The mountains of Palesne were the scene of tragical ents and of religious worship. here were volcanic suggesons at Sinai when the law was ven to Moses on the tables stone:

And the mountain burned with fire to the midst of heaven, with darkness, uds, and thick darkness. (Deut. 4:11.)

ocking Murder

We are in the midst of an idemic of crime of the blackt kind. In the number of urders committed we lead the orld. The murder of Ruth heeler, a fifteen-year-old girl, New York recently, was one the foulest in the annals of ime. This girl had finished r examinations at the Merhants' and Bankers' Business ollege and had applied for a ace as a stenographer. In anver to an inquiry on a postal rd, she was sent to an apartent in an uptown street, and now seems almost certain at Albert Wolter, who enticed r to these rooms, made away ith her. There is strong resumptive evidence that he rangled her and then put her dy in the fireplace, and after saturating it with al oil undertook to burn it up. Katie Mueller, ho was his companion on the night of the agedy, has given to the police some damaging testiony, which is pretty certain to extract a full conession and secure a conviction of Wolter. Wolter as a "cadet," or one who lives on the ruin of young irls. A man who would wickedly betray a child nd then kill her deserves the heaviest earthly penlty and the hottest place in the centre of the lake f fire. From the earliest days until now the path f the social evil has been marked with tragedies.

The wages of sin is death. (Rom. 6:23.)

ook Nail From Lung

A most remarkable operation was performed in he Beth-Israel Hospital in New York City the ther day upon Jacob Miller, a boy nine years of ge. About a month ago, while playing with some hildren, he drew a long breath and a nail an inch length went, as he supposed, down his throat. he boy coughed and choked a good deal and beame sick enough to go to bed. When a specialist as called it was discovered that the nail had been rawn into the boy's right lung. The little patient as laid upon the X-ray table, the X-ray lamp was laced so that the rays came through his body, and he nail was plainly visible in the right lung. Dr. uber, the physician, made an incision in the neck nd through to the windpipe. A tube was inserted, the surgeon ran a tiny pair of forceps down through it, and, grasping the nail, pulled it up. A fluorescent screen disclosed the lowering of the forceps, the grasping of the nail, and the gradual lifting of it. There is every prospect that the child will make a full recovery, and give another illustration of the advance in surgery and the benefit of the X-rays in practical operation and the salvation of a human life by medical wisdom and skill. The human soul is diseased and fatally injured with sin, and the Great Physician can cure every disease, repair every injury and save the life. Many can bear testimony to his wonderful curative power; but there are so many, young and old, who will not come to him and be saved. Jesus says regretfully of such:

And ye will not come to me that ye might have life. (John 5: 40.)

Mount Etna in Violent Eruption

Reforming the Saloon

The National Model License League is undertaking the impossible task of reforming the American saloon, and thus averting the hand of popular wrath which is destroying it. Mr. T. M. Gilmore, the president of that License League, recently wrote Dr. Lyman Abbott, asking his help in the work of purifying the liquor traffic. Several letters passed between these gentlemen. In one of these Mr. Gilmore says: "The people in this country consume 114,000,000 gallons of distilled spirits every year for beverage purposes, making 7,980,000,000 drinks. They consume, per capita, one and thirty-hundredths gallons of distilled liquors and thirty-two gallons of fermented liquors a year, and the habits and desires of so many people have a right to consideration." In his reply Dr. Abbott says: "The figures you give indicate that the evil is far greater than I had supposed, and the necessity for reform more urgent. All physicians are agreed that the excessive use of alcohol is a most prolific cause of disease, all sociologists, that it is the prolific cause of poverty, and all penologists that it is a prolfic cause of crime. And if your figures are correct, which I believe, that use would go far to account for disease, poverty and crime, which are three of the great burdens which the nation is carrying. You ask me what I would do in view of this state of facts. I would use all my influence to persuade my fellow-citizens not to patronize or support the saloons; second, to educate both the children and the adults to a rational understanding of the perils involved in an excessive use of alcohol; third, I would leave to each locality the question what measures it would take for the regulation of the saloon, and I would give to every locality power to prohibit it altogether." Mr. Gilmore concludes the correspondence with the astounding confession, which will be read from ocean to ocean: "I agree with physicians that the excessive use of alcohol is a prolific cause of disease, with sociologists that it is the prolific cause of poverty, with penologists that it is the prolific cause of crime, and I agree with you that each locality should be left free to adopt such method of reform as public opinion will support and enforce."

The hypocritical apology for the saloon, made by some ministers and politicians, is shamed by this confession of one of the most prominent liquor dealers in the nation. We believe he is making an honest attempt to reform the saloon, but we are sure he will fail in his undertaking. There is no solution of the saloon question, in times of an awakened conscience, except in its destruction. The Saviour, with great emphasis, declared the impossibility of getting anything good out of that which is essentially bad:

Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles? . . . A corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit. (Matt. 7:16, 17.)

Why Shackleton Missed the Pole

Sir Ernest H. Shackleton, who with three companions came within a hundred and eleven miles of the South Pole, arrived in New York the other day, with Lady Shackleton, to fill lecture engagements. A lack of provisions alone, he said, prevented his reaching the goal. "My equipment was perfect, but my food supply insufficient," he explained. "If I had had fifty pounds more I would have reached the Pole." He and his companions had to climb a glacier of 8,500 feet, which had cracks 1,000 feet deep, and stood on a mountain plateau which was 10,000 feet above the sea, when he had to turn back for want of food. Lieutenant Shackleton said to a reporter: "Except for reindeer boots and mits, we did not wear furs. Our garments were heavy woolens. We slept in tents that weighed thirty pounds, against which the snow drifted, keeping us warm. Most of the men who started with me I sent back to make caches of provisions. We were on short rations and hungry from November, 1908, until February 23, 1909, when we reached one of the caches on the return journey." Lieutenant Shackleton thought that Captain Scott, who starts next summer, would find the South Pole, but should he fail the lieutenant indicated that he might undertake the task of reaching the Pole himself. He does not think that automobiles or the aeroplane can be used to any practical advantage in the search for the Pole. Bread and meat are largely the measure of earthly endeavor, and even of spiritual success. Fifty pounds of food would have given Lieutenant Shackleton the Pole. That food is the necessity of physical life is expressed in the plea which the Egyptians, whose provisions were short, made to Joseph, who had plenty of corn in his storehouses.

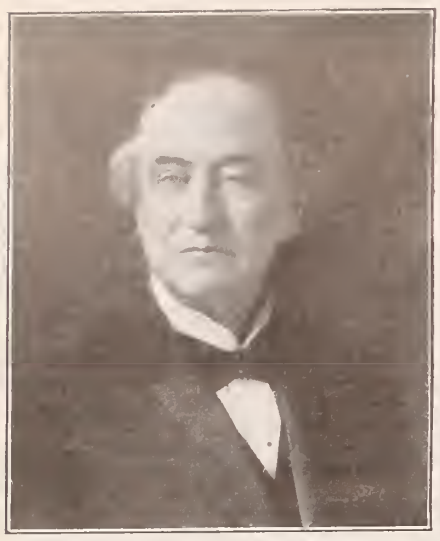
Give us bread; for why should we die in thy presence? (Gen. 47:15.)

A Wreath of Gratitude

Baron Kikuchi has just reached this country, commissioned by the Emperor of Japan to lay a wreath of national gratitude upon the grave of Dr. David Murray, at New Brunswick, N. J. Dr. Murray, who died five years ago, was a scholar who carried Christ and learning to the Orient. From 1876 to 1879 he was superintendent of education for Japan. He impressed upon the minds of the young, and the influential officers of the government, the necessity of a great university. His ideas were embodied in the establishment and growth of the Imperial University at Tokyo, and it was his signal service in the intellectual and moral quickening of Japan that led to the honor the Japanese government has so graciously bestowed upon his memory. The faithful sowing and bountiful reaping referred to by the psalmist has its expression in the seeds of truth Christ's loyal husbandman scattered in the fields of Japan a generation ago and in the fruitful harvest which now calls forth a nation's recognition and gratitude.

He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him. (Ps. 126:6.)

PROMINENT PEOPLE TALKED ABOUT



The Late Justice Brewer

John D. Rockefeller and His Son Returning from Church

Alexis Nikolajevitch, Future Emperor of Russia

IT was with a feeling of great regret and a sense of personal loss that the people of this country heard the news that Associate Justice David Josiah Brewer, of the Supreme Court, had passed away suddenly at his Washington home. He held a unique place in the hearts of the American people and was regarded as a fine example of what the American judge and jurist should be. The cause of his death was without doubt too constant application to his duties as a member of the supreme bench. He was a tireless worker, and when an important case was up for consideration would study its legal points far into the night. Recently the case of the Standard Oil Company has been before the court, and it is said he has been studying difficult parts of the testimony to eleven o'clock at night. To his friends, who protested, he said he was still able to do a young man's work.

Justice David Josiah Brewer was the son of an American missionary, Rev. Josiah Brewer, and was born in Smyrna, Asia Minor, June 20, 1837. When he was a year old his parents returned to America and made their home in Connecticut. Young Brewer went first to Wesleyan and then to Yale. He took his law courses at the Albany Law School. Doubtless his uncle, Stephen J. Field, influenced him in the choice of his career, as the uncle was a distinguished lawyer and for a time also a member of the Supreme Court.

The young lawyer went to Ft. Leavenworth, Kan., to practise, and made it his home for many years. He became a United States Commissioner, a judge, and was elected prosecuting attorney in 1870. Then he was promoted to the supreme bench of his State, and in 1889 President Harrison made him an associate justice of the Supreme Court, a position in which he soon made himself felt. He was firm in his patriotic loyalty to the Constitution; temporary waves of popular passion or prejudice he totally disregarded, every case was considered by him with strict impartiality and with the Constitution and its great legal interpreters as his guide. He was an earnest Christian, and for many years taught a Sunday School class in a prominent Washington church, and he often spoke of his desire to give more of his time to religious work.

His death leaves but seven justices on the bench to consider the two important cases of the Standard Oil and the American Tobacco Company, as Justice Moody is ill in Massachusetts.

ONE of the sights of New York at Easter is the "church parade" up and down Fifth Avenue, when the people who have been to the morning service stroll slowly along the broad sidewalks to see, and, if they have indulged in the proverbial Easter finery, also to be seen. This year the crowd was numbered by the tens of thousands, though it was said the sartorial display and the variety of feminine headgear was not so great as on previous years.

People stood on the steps of the houses and considered themselves fortunate if they had some one with them who could point out the notabilities of the metropolis in the passing throng.

Among those who walked up the avenue after service was John D. Rockefeller, who is a constant attendant at the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, and his son, well known as the president of its young men's Bible class. Mr. Rockefeller, always more or less in the public eye, has been of even greater interest to the passerby since it was announced that he had started the greatest charitable foundation in the world. His son has been conspicuous as foreman of the recent jury investigating the "white slave traffic," and for the first time the public became acquainted with his personal appearance through the pictures published in the papers during his term of service. He is to have charge of the new Rockefeller Foundation and will give his entire time to it, instead of serving on the board of management of his father's company.

Mr. Rockefeller, Sr., has not been actively engaged in business, it is said, for ten years until recently, when he went back to the office on lower Broadway to keep in closer touch with the way things were being conducted.

THERE was consternation in the low, rambling imperial palace of Tsarskoe-Selo, near St. Petersburg, Russia, on March 24. Orderlies rushed hither and thither, guards were searching everywhere, and there was anxiety in the heart of the Emperor and Empress, not because of rumors of any plot or of revolution, but because the Crown Prince, little six-year-old Alexis had disappeared mysteriously from the park. Everybody at once imagined that the most dire things had happened and for several hours there was great suspense. The soldiers of the Imperial Guard were searching every nook of the surrounding country to discover some trace of their future ruler, but to no avail.

Meanwhile, a lady of St. Petersburg who was walking about three miles from the palace, was greatly surprised to meet the young czarevitch along the road. He inquired the way to St. Petersburg, but she took him toward the palace. He told of his plans to be a sailor like Peter the Great, of whom he had been often told by his tutors. "They will not catch me now," he said in high glee.

The Emperor and Empress were greatly relieved when the little runaway was brought back to them, and it is probable that the desire of the little sailor to go to sea will not be gratified for some years to come. The Empress presented the lady who had brought her son home a costly bracelet in token of her gratitude. The Empress has not been in good health lately, and it was feared that her son's absence would cause a relapse. At last reports, however, she was much improved. The more pacific state of affairs has doubtless helped greatly. The Emperor drives alone through the streets of St. Petersburg, without even an orderly by his side, a rather risky thing to do, his ministers feel, but it has pleased his people.

IOWA'S WORST RAILROAD WRECK

IN the most terrible wreck that ever happened in Iowa 42 people lost their lives on March 21, and thirty or more were injured, eight of whom died of the injuries. The wreck occurred at a point four and one-half miles north of Green Mountain, on the Chicago and Great Western, when two consolidated Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific trains, detouring because of another wreck, went into the ditch at 8:16 A.M.

The high mortality among the passengers was due to the manner in which the engines—which were both running backward at fully thirty miles an hour and contrary to law—toppled over after being derailed and stuck in the clay bank of the cut. When these engines fell to the southeast, they buried their sides deep in the yellow clay and the impact stopped them short. It was this sudden stop that shot the Pullman sleeper, like a giant catapult, back upon the next car in its rear, the smoking-car, and these two crushed back into the third car, the day coach, crumpling it for more than one-half of its length. Because of this telescoping the greatest loss of life was in the smoking-car and ladies' car. The smoking-car was reduced to kindling wood and part of the ladies' car was also crushed to fragments. It was a horrible sight of mangled limbs and of blood splashed everywhere that met the gaze of the relief party, who came from Marshalltown in a special train. Until the relief train arrived the dead and dying and injured were carried out and laid in a pasture, fronting the right-of-way of the road. It is estimated that this wreck will cost the railroad company fully $500,000.

Mining Fatalities

THE number of men who meet their death in the occupations of peace fully equal the number slain in a sanguinary war, odd as the statement may appear. James F. Gailbraith, Jr., secretary of the American Mining Congress, says that in the last thirty years 30,000 miners have been killed in accidents, an average of 1,000 a year, and that during that period 100,000 have been injured in the coal mines alone. In 1907, 3,125 men lost their lives in coal mines. He has urged the formation of a bureau of mines, as in Europe, where the loss of life is much less. This is only one of the "dangerous trades." The total of all would make a startling figure.

THE BUDDING SPRING-TIME

Rummaging

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

AT this season every housekeeper finds part of her work laid out for her under the specification "rummaging." We may be as fastidious s we possibly can during the whole round year. very week the house may be swept and garnished, very room gone over, every closet kept in order, so hat an appearance of immaculate freshness is pre-nted to visitors and the family circle. Neverthe-ss, in the lifelong battle with dust, which we are estined to wage from the cradle to the grave, there mes an hour when the campaign labeled "annual ring cleaning" must be inaugurated. There are veral methods of cleaning in the spring. If the use needs papering and painting and general ren-vating, it may be necessary to have it all upset at nce, and if this be your case, gentle reader, take old of your patience with both hands. Persuade e nervous member of the family to go away on at long-promised visit to an old schoolmate or an nt in the country, get your husband and the boys take their meals somewhere else for a few days, d then, with as many helpers as you can muster, t your wits to work and as fast as you can com-ete your strenuous undertak-g. If you are not compelled wait indefinitely for masons d paper-hangers, who leave the middle of a job at your use to do something on a job another, you are a fortunate oman. In any event, be hope-l and cheery and indomitable. eep steadily before your eyes e vision of the house beauti-l, in which you are to live hen your home is resplendent restored brightness, when the gs are beaten, the furniture lished, the windows clear as ystal, the books set in trim ray on the library shelves, d everything in such perfect der that you would not be hamed if called upon to enter-in the President.

Ideal house cleaning is of an posite character. It is so anned and carried forward at the family are not in the ast inconvenienced. A room a time is selected for the lministration of brush and oom, soap and water, and hen that is entirely as it ould be another is taken, and fore one dreams of it, so the table housekeeper assures us, e house has been put in order. there be a superlative ideal, is attained by her who, re-ding in a city apartment use, sends for the compressed-air people and lets em come with their machine, giving them free ense to clear the house in every nook and cranny every slightest particle of dust. A house thus eaned is certified to be freed from malefic germs. It was rummaging, however, that this talk should ve dwelt upon. Have you never been impressed th the surprising way in which lost articles come light in rummaging days? For a whole winter, r example, you could not find a pair of tan gloves. ou were particular to keep your gloves, fingers lled out straight, thumbs laid across the palm, in box by themselves. That is, of course, if you had y pride in your top drawer. Even granting dis-der in the top drawer, you were careful of your oves, yet the tan ones eluded your search. When e rummaging time arrived, lo! they were discov-ed in a dark corner on a shelf in the closet, hidden hind a hat box. How they came there must re-ain an unsolved mystery. A lady about to change r place of abode called up a friend on the tele-one, and told her of quaint, odd volumes, dating ck nearly two generations, that she had discovered en rummaging in an attic. The treasure-trove at pertains to rummaging was a while ago utilized r charity, and did very well until people forgot to altogether honorable and allowed themselves the ense of selling foolish buyers things that should ve gone upon the rubbish heap.

Rummaging has its droll side and its mournful side, too. In this world smiles and tears chase each other as the April sunbeams and the April showers. We must often make our own rainbows, and, let happen what may, must bear ourselves bravely in the face of the great trials and the petty vexations, the latter sometimes proving our mettle as thoroughly as the former.

Circumstantial Evidence

No matter how complete in itself a chain of circumstantial evidence may be it is often misleading, because it rests to some extent on theory and in reality may break down at an important turning. The case of Mrs. Maybrick is in point. Condemned to death in England many years ago for the alleged poisoning of her husband, the sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. At the end of fifteen years of hard labor in prison Mrs. Maybrick was released on parole and returned to her native land. Petitions for her pardon were made at the beginning of her imprisonment, were signed by thousands in this country, among the signatures being those of members of the President's Cabinet and judges of the Supreme Court in this country. Nothing availed to set free this American woman, granddaughter of an admiral in our service, delicately reared and educated in one of the best private schools of the country.

A Scottish barrister, who was present at all the sessions of her trial, wrote a large volume showing in detail its various fallacies. Mrs. Maybrick's innocence is firmly believed in by thousands of her countrywomen to-day and of her countrymen. Her sad face and the fact that she is forever separated from her children appeal to all hearts, yet she is fortunate in having at last attained her liberty.

There is little doubt that innocent persons have often been unjustly condemned to death, and have suffered the extreme penalty of the law wholly on circumstantial evidence. It would seem as if we should hesitate before condemning in our own mind people who are suspected or accused of criminal action when there is to fortify the case against them only a combination of strange circumstances. Few weeks pass in which the newspapers do not record instances of the kind. While it is to the last degree foolish and futile to sentimentalize over actual crime that is proven and patent to the world, there is room for charity in our judgments when a case is not proven.

IN THE PASTURE

Green is the summer pasture-land,
Sweet is the murmur of the brook;
The trees by gentle winds are fanned,
There's beauty wheresoe'er we look.

Life's Eventide

A DEAR aged lady, left desolate by the death of her last remaining relative, said to one whom she knew: "Tell me something to comfort me in my solitude. I am alone with my memories, I miss the voices I used to hear, and there has stolen over me a dread that I will never hear them again and nevermore see those whom I have loved and lost."

Life's eventide should not be gray and sorrowful; it should be like a summer sunset, where the golden, rose, and opal clouds are piled in masses in the Western sky. But often old people are not very strong, and they suffer from morbidness simply through the lack of physical vitality. If they have either deafness or blindness to bear, the days seem long, and they do not sleep so well at night as they used to when they were young. They should guard against setting down to the account of spiritual depression that which is merely the expression of bodily weakness. If they will but feel that a few steps farther on the fog will lift, and they will see clearly the home beyond, they will be cheered and sustained. It may be something like the experience we have had in taking a journey and reaching an inn after dark. The road was steep, and it sometimes seemed as if we might have lost the way as now we plunged into the depths of a forest and again skirted the edge of a precipice, but in the end we emerged upon an open plain and there in front of us, with lights twinkling in every window and lights streaming from the door, was the house to which we were going. A step from the stage, and friends came running out with words of welcome and smiling faces. So it will be when we get home. One and another will greet us. "Why," we will say, "here are Jenny and Ruth, and Jack and Harry. Here is Cousin Mary, here are mother and father. And who is this? Who, indeed, but the little one who slipped out of our arms when she was a wee thing, and here she is a fair daughter in her Father's house."

Not as a child shall we again behold her,
But when with accents mild
And rapturous glances we again enfold her
She will not be a child,
But a fair maiden in her Father's mansion.

It is pleasant to think that we shall make acquaintance in the homeland with groups of people whom we have never seen and who have been only names to us, but whose habits, modes of thought and education have influenced us. Think of meeting ancestors! Few of us have ever seen a great-grandparent.

The dear aged friend who feels lonely here must be comforted by thinking that old age and infirmity will drop from her like outworn garments when she gets home, and that she will be young again and very happy. Did she say that she was not good enough? Ah, it is not our own goodness in which we trust, but the perfect goodness and ceaseless grace of our blessed Saviour, who is always saying: "In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so I would have told you. I will come again and receive you unto myself."

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—NELLY BLY. To manicure your nails you need a small pair of scissors and a nail file. If you are careful to soften the cuticle at the root of the nails by the use of a little cold cream every night you will have no trouble in keeping your nails in order.

—S. C. "Is it permissible to call upon a young lady three or four times in a single week, and how late in the evening may a young man stay?" The query apparently comes from the young man himself. Unless very intimate, once a week is sufficiently often to call, and the call should terminate soon after ten o'clock.

THE LABOR TEMPLE AND ITS MISSION

Rev. Charles Stelzle

By C. M. MEYER

"THE average workingman is naturally religious, although that religion may not always be expressed in the accepted orthodox manner."

This is the principle upon which the Rev. Charles Stelzle, superintendent of the well-known Presbyterian Departments of Church and Labor and Immigration, is about to base a unique experiment in the crowded section of New York. Fourteenth Street is one of the busiest amusement streets on the East Side of the city. Its sidewalks at night are black with a continuously moving crowd of people—the great mass of humanity that is seeking relaxation after a hard day's work. Streams of brilliant lights advertise all sorts of attractions, to which the crowds only too willingly respond. To show what can be done with just such a field as this the Presbyterian Department of Church and Labor is to take hold of the old Fourteenth Street Church, whose congregation recently voted to consolidate with the Thirteenth Street Church. The Presbyterian Church Extension Committee and the Home Mission Board of the same denomination have taken over this historic building, which is located on the corner of Fourteenth Street and Second Avenue, placing it under the direction of Mr. Stelzle.

There is probably no one better able to take hold of a congregationless church in the heart of a big city, and to inaugurate a new work adapted to the needs of the people of the community, than Mr. Stelzle. He was born on the East Side of New York, and for twenty-five years lived among the working-people of that district. For eight years he worked in a machine shop—one of the largest in New York City, which employs thousands of men. Most of his life has been spent among men, and, as is to be expected in a man of his peculiar experience, his sympathies are strongly with the working-people. Those who have heard Mr. Stelzle speak know how strongly opposed he is to the desertion of downtown fields by churches whose members have either moved uptown or to the suburbs. The new undertaking at the Fourteenth Street Church is a protest against this tendency. With regard to this enterprise Mr. Stelzle says:

"The department has always advocated the principle that the church is simply a means to an end, and not an end in itself, and that we are to labor not for the building up of the church, but for the building up of the people. This will be the motto of the Labor Temple. It will seek to minister to all the needs of the people living in the community, to fight their battles and plead their cause. In other words, it will seek to practically apply the principles of Jesus Christ to the social problems of the day and to indicate clearly and positively the attitude of the church toward these problems."

It is Mr. Stelzle's purpose to make this enterprise peculiarly a workingman's institution. Democracy will be its keynote. The building will be open all day and every night in the week. It will be as busy as any amusement place in the neighborhood. But, while it is to be a social enterprise to a certain extent, more prominence will be given to the presentation of the Bible in a graphic way—by the best Bible teachers obtainable—than is attempted in the ordinary church. It will be the aim of those in charge to secure speakers of the broadest sympathies—economic, social and religious—to address the various meetings.

At first probably the strongest appeal will be made to men. On Sunday afternoons it is planned to have men's mass meetings, at which social and economic questions will be discussed from a religious viewpoint by speakers of national reputation. It is hoped out of these men's meetings to develop a brotherhood which will consist of the men in the community who believe in the task of lifting up the common man. Membership will not be confined to churchmen, or even so-called Christian men, but an endeavor will be made to enlist all those who are interested in the social, economic and moral welfare of the working-people of the city. On Sunday evenings there will be a popul service, with special music, distinctively religio in character. During the week, on different eve ings, there will be addresses and debates on vit "human life" problems, with questions and discu sions by the audience; inspirational addresses a success talks by men and women whose lives a conspicuous because of their achievements in vario walks of life; socials and receptions, for mutu acquaintance and the cultivation of sociability, which time light refreshments will be served; di cussions on the English Bible, the people's Mag Charta, by the best scholars and teachers availab who will present the subject from the social, ec nomic, ethical and religious viewpoints. Saturd night will be the popular amusement night of t week for the men and women who need relaxatio On this night there will be concerts, folk son impersonations, readings, recitals, tableaux, e This schedule shows enough variety to attract sorts of people.

Rev. George Dugan

A number of prominent speakers have alrea promised their services. Frank Morrison, secreta of the American Federation of Labor, will addre the opening meeting, which will be a me mass meeting, on the afternoon of April 1 Congressman William S. Bennett, of New Yor Jacob Riis, Lincoln Steffens, John Spargo, Norm Hapgood, Ray Stannard Baker, Robert Hunt John Mitchell and Rev. W. W. White, D.D., have signified their willingness to speak at differe meetings.

The pastor in immediate charge of the work w be the Rev. George Dugan, a Princeton gradua who has made a conspicuous success of his work Toledo, O. He is a man thoroughly interested workingmen, as is shown by the repeated acknow edgments from labor leaders in Toledo for the pa he has taken in their cause. With two such men Mr. Stelzle and Dr. Dugan at the head of this ent prise the Labor Temple should be a great success.

me as the respect and regard of those who are Protestants. On my journey through Africa I visited many Catholic as well as many Protestant missions, and I look forward to telling the people at home all that has been done by Protestants and Catholics alike as I saw it in the field of missionary endeavor. It would cause me a real pang to have anything said or done that would hurt or give pain to my friends, whatever their religious belief, but any merely personal considerations are of no consequence in this matter.

"The important consideration is the avoidance of harsh and bitter comment such as may excite mistrust and anger between and among good men. The more an American sees of other countries the more profound must be his feelings of gratitude that in his own land there is not merely complete toleration but the heartiest good will and sympathy between sincere and honest men of different faith—good will and sympathy so complete that in the inevitable daily relations of our American life Catholics and Protestants meet together and work together without the thought of difference of creed being even present in their minds.

"This is a condition so vital to our national well-being that nothing should be permitted to jeopard it. Bitter comment and criticism, acrimonious attack and defense are not only profitless but harmful, and to seize upon such an incident as this as an occasion for controversy would be wholly indefensible and should be frowned upon by Catholics and Protestants alike. I very earnestly hope that what I say will appeal to all good Americans. Faithfully yours, THEODORE ROOSEVELT."

A Message of Peace

In the forthcoming number of The Outlook, the following editorial from the pen of Dr. Abbott will appear:

"Mr. Roosevelt has rendered a service to the country by his maintenance of American principles in his correspondence with the Vatican and by his Message of Peace to the American people. He could not honorably have done other than he did. An Ex-President of the United States could not visit Rome and fail to ask for an audience with the Pope without a palpable slight to the Holy Father. He could not accept the conditions imposed by the Vatican without a violation of the essential spirit of American brotherhood: that religious differences must not affect social relations. Catholics as well as Protestants in America will agree with the judgment of Mr. John Callan O'Laughlin, himself an American Catholic, who was in Rome, in conference both with Mr. Roosevelt and with the Vatican, and who cables to the New York Times the judgment which he shares with liberal Catholics in Italy: 'Familiar as I am with all the facts, and looking at his action from the view-point of an American Catholic, I personally feel that any other action Colonel Roosevelt might have taken would have resulted in the humiliation not only of himself but of the American people, Catholic as well as Protestant, and would have established an unwise precedent of serious consequences in the future.'

"In what spirit will the American people take this incident? In what spirit will the Protestant churches in general and the Methodist Church in particular receive it? How all loyal disciples of Jesus Christ ought to receive it is made very clear by an incident in the life of their Master. It is narrated of him that, with some of his disciples, he was traveling through Samaria one day, and sought the hospitality of a Samaritan village. The villagers refused to receive him because he appeared to going to Jerusalem, and the Samaritans would ha nothing to do with the residents of Jerusalem b cause they treated the Samaritan religion with d respect. The disciples were very angry at this ins to their Master, and wished to call down fire fr heaven on the inhospitable village. But the Mast rebuked them. You do not understand, he said, t Christ spirit. And with no further word of remo strance they went to another village.

"America claims to be the land of toleration. it? The Protestant churches claim to be tolera churches. Are they? We shall soon see. Gra that the Vatican has shown itself intolerant. C we be tolerant of intolerance?

"The Outlook has held back the press for t arrival of this anticipated report, and is going press before there has been any expression of pub opinion upon it. We do not expect unanimity opinion. But we do expect to see 'bitter comme and acrimonious attack and defense' the exceptio We do expect to see the Nation and the Protesta churches generally meet this incident in the spi of Mr. Roosevelt's letter. We do expect that t spirit of good will and sympathy between Catho and Protestant Americans will not be interfer with. We do not believe that this incident w eventually prove to be even, what it has been call 'regrettable.' In America Protestant and Cathol Gentile and Jew, Believer and Agnostic, not or meet upon terms of equality in social fellowshi they stand upon the same platform and unite common enterprises for the welfare of their fello men. The ultimate effect of this incident should to make this principle better comprehended a more loyally appreciated, not only in America, b throughout the civilized world."

ow the Women Pulled the Bell

(By an Occasional Correspondent)

ERUSALEM has many sites and buildings of interest, but probably one of them all remains longer in e mind of the traveler as a landmark an the Russian Tower of Olivet. Its eat height and impressiveness, added the fact of its location at the very mmit of Olivet, make it a thing to long remembered by any one who s visited the Holy City in the last arter of a century. The great bell the tower, which rings out over the y below, and into the surrounding lleys, and even on the other side of e mountains, down on the road to- rd Jericho and the Dead Sea, has a ry strange history; and though tales sacrifice and heroism for the cause Christ are not uncommon down rough the history of the faith, the le of the three hundred Russian peas- nt women who took the bell from affa to the Mount of Olives has few arallels.

The bell was cast in Russia, in the te '70's of the last century. After nsiderable delay it was delivered at dessa, and loaded upon one of the reat freight boats that ply their trade the Black Sea and the Mediterra- ean. When the steamer arrived in affa, in July, 1882, the officials were onfronted with a grave problem when ey came to land the bell. Every re- ource of the freight agent was taxed get the great mass from the hold to raft constructed for the purpose.

Fortunately, the water was not un- sually rough, and the bell was at last terally rolled on to a sandy part of e beach. Agreements were made ith Jaffa contractors to move it on up Jerusalem. The first effort in this irection was a half-hearted one, two rdinary carts of the town being joined nd the bell placed upon them. Of ourse, the contrivance broke at once, nd the enterprise was delayed again. he contractors, after long and weary argainings, agreed, for an exorbi- ant sum, to construct a special wagon or the purpose. This was done, but he second vehicle broke as easily as id the first. Disgusted now, the mov- ng agents refused to touch the bell gain, and there in the sand of the affa beach it lay nearly two years.

In the autumn of 1884 several hun- red Russian pilgrims landed at Jaffa, n their way to Jerusalem. These easant travelers heard of the bell and f its condition, and resolved to do the ork themselves. Three hundred were nen, and these were old and weak. he women, however, were young and trong and exceedingly resolute. They uilt a great cart, such as they use in he villages and on the great plains of heir native land, only larger and nuch stronger. Their precious load vas soon fastened upon it. Long opes were fastened to the cart, and, vith every one of the three hundred ulling and praying at the same time, he journey was begun. Once the pro- ession was out of the city on the oad proper an organization of forces vas effected, whereby it was arranged hat half should pull while the others rested, so that no stops need be made, save at night.

Their simple food, soup and black read, was always taken hurriedly; and up hill and down, along the tortuous curves of the road, the queer cavalcade moved, slowly, but always surely. The few old men, useless for work at the ropes, led the women in songs of praise and in prayer. Those who saw all this speak of the wonderful joy that seemed to fill every heart of the whole com- pany.

Three days were occupied for the trip, but the last few miles were the hardest of all. The narrow path along the north side of the old city wall, east of the Damascus gate, was practically impassable for any sort of a vehicle. Again it was the women who believed that it could be carried through. The cart was stuck, and greater rocks were

His Great Life-Work Must Go On

Letters of sympathy and helpfulness continue to flow in from readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in every State. These are especially grateful at the present time. A few of the letters are given below. As it is impossible to reproduce all, we take this opportunity of thanking all of our readers for their kind wishes and appreciation.

Face to Face

Our hearts have been sad on account of the death of our friend, Dr. Klopsch. He was a man we loved. He did much in building up Christ's kingdom on earth. Great is his reward in heaven. We shall meet him face to face in the kingdom of Christ. JAMES W. PATTERSON.
Charleston, S. C.

The Lord Will Guide His Work

Who can take his place? Who can do this wonderful work which he has been doing? Then came the thought, "Our God is not straitened that he cannot furnish a man, one after his own heart, that can take up the work and carry it forward, even to perfection." We will trust him. MRS. J. M. WALLER.
St. Joseph, Mo.

An Easter Wish

How I wished this Eastern morn we could get a message from him. What a message it would be! But we can only live on and hope to meet him on the other shore, where sickness and death do not come.
ROSE AESCHBACH.
Lowville, N. Y.

His Work Lives On

We hope THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S work will continue to grow and prosper, as the great work of D. L. Moody is doing. "He is dead, yet he liveth."
WILLIAM FREEBORN.
Wadsworth, O.

His Work Will Live After Him

I join the great multitude in mourning for Dr. Klopsch, but hope his good work, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will go on.
R. A. WILLIAMS.
Poultney, Vt.

Good Wishes for the Work

With sincere sympathy and condolences in your great affliction, wishing you an unbounded success in carrying on the great work of him who has left us, and praying that his mantle may fall on some one of the staff of workers in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family,
J. I. BOGENRIEF.
Iowa Falls, Ia.

An Example to Emulate

But what a splendid memory he has left for us. He has but gone home to his reward, and we can but rejoice in his joy and strive to follow his noble example.
MRS. E. S. TINKHAM.
Orleans, Vt.

The Work Will Go On

For about twenty years I have been writing to Dr. Klopsch every year concerning THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I trust some one else will carry on the work he has laid down.
MRS. E. M. GRAY.
East Springfield, Pa.

Sympathy and Blessing

I have been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a number of years, and am sadly pained to note the death of Dr. Klopsch. It is very hard to believe our great chief has gone from us. We bow in reverence to God's will. We pray for his blessings on the paper and its staff. J. C. HAVNAER.
Grass Valley, Ore.

He Was a "Chosen Vessel"

Truly a great man has fallen; and it is to us a mystery we cannot understand. This beloved name is known and loved wherever suffering and want have existed, over the whole face of the globe. The dear Lord will have to consecrate another as he did this chosen vessel for service. All through the work in India I have been in touch with Dr. Klopsch, and revere his memory.
MRS. J. D. EDWARDS.
Walterboro, S. C.

Regarded Him as Their Friend

We are deeply grieved at the loss of a man we have always considered our friend, Dr. Klopsch. With best wishes for THE HERALD'S success, Elmore, Minn. W. O. DUSTIN.

God's Way Not Our Way

Dr. Klopsch was removed early in life, and in the midst of great usefulness. But God's way is past finding out. A. G. LAKIN.
Winwood, Pa.

He Was Ever Doing Good

He did more good than any other man in this country. He was a very, very wonderful man, and will have a high place in heaven. He was very kind to me. How glad I am that I have the Red Letter Testament to keep for his sake.
ISABELLA KIRKLAND.
Springfield, Ore.

Another Takes Up the Burden

I desire to express my sympathy for your great loss, as well as to the many he had helped during his noble life. Trusting that another deeply consecrated life may be ready to take up the work of Dr. Klopsch at the place where he laid it down to answer the summons, "Come home. MRS. ANNIE DUNLEAVY.
Hayword's, Calif.

The Lord's Work Never Stands Still

I have been wondering who can take up the work he has left. But I know the Lord's work never stands still. He will provide for every necessity. MRS. L. W. FALKNER.
North Augusta, Ontario, Canada.

To Carry On the Work

We were very sorry to learn of Dr. Klopsch's death. We hope some one will take his place and carry on the noble and grand work he had begun. MRS. ALBERT G. KELLEY.
Coulterville, Ill.

A Great Educator

He did much good to the distressed. We hope the paper will go on, as it is a great educator.
O. MILTON PHILIPS.
Glen Moore, Pa.

A Loss to the World

His death fills my heart with grief for his loss to the world, but I know God makes no mistakes. May his mantle fall on one fitted to take his place. MRS. M. L. POTTS.
Biltmore, N. C.

"God's Good Man"

He was "God's good man." There will be many stars in his crown, for he has turned many to the way of righteousness.
MRS. ELLEN FOXALL.
Wakefield, R. I.

ahead; but the whole three hundred knelt in prayer, in the heat of a glaring noontide sun. And when they rose and took the ropes once more the load moved, and not once did it stop till it was across the Valley of Jehosaphat, past Gethsemane, and up on the side of Olivet, ready to be hung in its place.

The tower was soon built over the bell, and the other and smaller members of the famous chime hung around it. The landmark of all the country is the Russian tower, guarding the sacred mount and city, but the glory of the tower is the bell.

Among the Workers

—REV. DR. CAMPBELL-MORGAN has been conducting a mission in Bradford, England, and addressing large audiences.

—CHARLES ALEXANDER, Dr. Chapman's associate, holds that ministers would be the gainers by having a song service in their churches at least once a month, such service always to be closed with an earnest appeal for souls.

—GIPSY SMITH is now in Paris conducting a series of revival meetings at the Salle Gaveau, to large audiences of English and Americans, with a sprinkling of French. He occasionally addresses a French audience through an interpreter.

—TENT EVANGEL, the Gospel tabernacle under canvas, which has done such excellent service in New York for several seasons, is again open. Leading metropolitan pastors will preach in it during the coming summer, as in former years.

—EVANGELIST C. R. HAUDENSCHIELD, of Chicago, Ill., has held one of the most gracious meetings ever held in the State of Wyoming, at Lander. The town was deeply stirred. Many prominent men were converted, and some of the churches largely added to their membership.

—REV. JAMES WALTER DOUGHTY, who was some years a missionary in Japan, has been delivering in New York, during this season, a series of very able lectures on that highly interesting people. For the coming season he has a new lecture on the women of Japan and their part in building up its unique civilization.

—THE NEW hospital at Pingtu, China, built in memory of Dr. J. M. Oxner, the physician who died at his post in 1907, was completed and opened for patients in October, 1909. Dr. Hearn has charge of the hospital work, which is self-supporting, although a number of the very poor have been treated free of charge.

—REV. GERARD A. BAILLY, a worker of the Christian and Missionary Alliance, in Caracas, Venezuela, was attacked by a mob while preaching at Guarenas lately. His Italian helper was abused and thrown into a ditch, and the Bibles used in the service were destroyed. The American and Italian Ministers have united in a demand for an investigation.

—EVANGELIST J. B. PHILIPS is now holding a series of meetings at Warwick, N. Y., after which he will begin his annual tour in the South. He says he finds that evangelist work is chiefly demanded in the North in cold weather and in the South in the summer. During his season North, just closing, he has conducted meetings at Newark, N. J.; New York City, Hackensack, N. J.; Elizabeth, N. J.; Elmhurst, L. I.; Freehold, N. J., and at Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

—PRESIDENT TAFT, Ex-President Roosevelt, Governor Hughes of New York, Editor Henry Watterson, Jacob H. Schiff, the banker, and eleven other Americans prominent in education, the church, statesmanship and commerce have signed a letter permitting the use of their names as strongly recommending the movement for the endowment of Tuskegee Institute, Alabama. It is proposed to secure $300,000 toward the endowment fund during the present school year.

—MISSIONARY T. J. BACH, writing from Maracaibo, Venezuela, thanks THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for remittances for his work. He says: "The mission boat El Heraldo Cristiano is still in commission on the lake, but gasoline in Venezuela costs $2 a gallon, which is prohibitive. Its last trip was to a leper island, which has 500 leper inhabitants. The mission, during the year, has distributed large numbers of Bibles, Testaments and portions, to good purpose."

I Know

I KNOW He will not spurn my plea—
The Christ who died my soul to save—
Nor let my prayer unanswered be;
But surely grant the grace I crave.

When shadows gather o'er my head,
And pleasures fail on every side;
Though darkness round my pathway spread,
I'll trust His unseen hand to guide.

Though tempests rudely toss my bark,
This Pilot then to me will say,
"Though storms beat fierce, the night be dark,
I am the Light, I am the Way."

What peace and joy my soul shall fill,
When by His grace so fully blest;
And I have done my Master's will
And in this full assurance rest.
—J. HENRY BAILEY.

Questions and Answers

In forwarding MSS. to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, enclose stamped envelopes for return, if unavailable.

Mrs. F. A. Hummel, Humboldt, Neb. Please tell me where I can find information regarding the culinary art of France.

One of the best French cook books is Nouvelle Cuisine Bourgeoise, by Urban Dubois. You can get it by writing to any of the large bookselling houses of New York or Chicago.

Canadian Subscriber, Toronto. I have read with interest and satisfaction your account of the refusal of the Pope to receive Mr. Fairbanks; also, the short editorial on the incident, and I am of the opinion that a few more snubs of this kind would be a good thing, for it would cause the American people to wake up and do a little serious thinking as to the attitude and policy of the Papacy. Where would our civil and religious liberty be if Rome had its own way? You say it is a "coveted honor" to be presented at the Vatican. Should it be a coveted honor for a Protestant to pay homage to a man who is keeping millions of his followers in gross ignorance, superstition, and worse? Do you consider the Romish Church to exercise a beneficent influence; or rather is it not, on the contrary, a blighting and withering one, wherever it exists and flourishes?

It is a "coveted honor" in the worldly sense only, and this was what we intended to convey. We are wholly in agreement with our correspondent's views on the subject.

H. H. S., Springfield, O. Is it wrong to dance and play cards? I know harm can be made out of both, and it is usually the very worst kind. Several efforts have been made to convince me that dancing was "perfectly harmless" and "all right"; but I could not see it that way.

Cards are the implements of the gambler and the cheat. Harmless they may be in themselves, but their associations are not so. Besides, we owe to others the influence of a good example, and we should avoid "even the appearance of evil." Hence, for the sake of others whom we might influence to a wrong idea of life and to evil courses, we do well to let cards alone. Dancing leads to promiscuous and undesirable acquaintanceships and exposes young people, especially young girls, to undesirable associations. There are many of the dances of the day that are decidedly objectionable. The ballroom has been to many the first step to ruin.

M. H., Lancaster, Pa. Is there any difference between a republican form of government and a democracy, as applied to our form of government, or are the two terms synonymous?

The two terms are synonymous and are used interchangeably. In our country they are the names of two parties, both agreeing on the same form of government but differing as to policies in the conduct of its affairs.

W. A. P., Prentiss Vale, Pa. I notice an article in March Cosmopolitan, "Away from Ancient Altars," and am wondering whether its statements will go unchallenged by the religious press. Its opening sentence is: "Colleges devoted to the education of women have revised the accepted estimate of life, with startling consequences to ancient creeds." Further on it says: "President ———, of ———, not only tells his own students, but has sent the message out to all the students of this land, that the modern world, at least the intelligent and thoughtful portion, has outgrown the old idea that God sent his Son to earth, announcing his advent by signs and wonders; or that this Son was authorized to forgive sinners who conformed to the terms revealed." As I understand it, the claim is made that all the colleges for women are teaching and training their students to leave the Bible and God out of the account, as of no practical use or good. Is that a true statement of the condition of those colleges?

We are receiving letters similar to the foregoing from other localities. It is undeniable that the teaching in many of our colleges—women's included—has a strong leaning toward agnosticism and universalism. The old Bible is mocked and its record is termed mere "myth" and "tradition." One professor learnedly writes of Rachel and Leah as "totems." Others stand up in class-rooms and talk profoundly of the "Adamic legend," the "Moses myth," the "Samson folk-lore story," etc. From piecemeal Bible dissection to wholesale condemnation of God's Book is the inevitable route of the teaching which some, in the name of science, have been inflicting upon our colleges and universities increasingly during the last ten years. In not a few cases it has become open and avowed infidelity. It is not true, however, that all the colleges suffer from this murrain of unbelief. It is a startling phase of education, and, being founded in error, it cannot last. The revulsion will come which must ultimately sweep our colleges and universities clear of infidelity, masking under the cloak of science. True science is not at war with Scripture, and it is not the men of real scholarship, but the pseudo-scientists, who are not at all well-founded in the Bible, who are the chief offenders.

M. S., Cuthbert, Ga. 1. What is the origin of finding your natal birthday in the book of Proverbs, chapter 21 for men and 31 for women? 2. What is the origin of the adage, "As poor as Job's turkey"?

1. It probably had its origin in an old superstition that, by turning to a certain portion of the Bible with eyes averted, and opening the volume at random, you would find the answer to your wishes. Of course, it was a foolish superstition, nothing more. 2. The origin of this saying cannot be traced. It has reference to the patriarch when he was deprived of all his worldly possessions. Shakespeare, in Henry IV., says "I am as poor as Job," which is probably the closest approach to the quotation that can be found. One old writer says that the phrase was founded on the fact that "Job's turkey was so poor and lean that it had only a single feather."

Subscriber, Eugene, Ore. Who is the author of the sentence "God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb"?

It occurs in Laurence Sterne's works (1713-1768). In the writings of Henri Etienne (1594) is found the sentence, "God measures the cold to the shorn lamb."

W. J. K., Halifax, N. S., and Miss M. E. F. B., Cambridge, Mass. Please tell the name of the poem from which the stanza on "Watching" was taken, in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 26, and where can it be found?

It is from the poem "Coming," by Barbara Miller McAndrew, and can be found in Schaff & Gilman's Library of Religious Poetry (Funk & Wagnalls, New York), and in some other anthologies.

C. B. H., Alton, Ia. 1. What became of the tract of land which the United States Government gave to Lafayette, on his visit to this country after the Revolutionary War? 2. How can mildew stains be taken out of clothes? 3. Why did not one of Leopold's children become ruler of Belgium?

1. We cannot find in any history what was done with the land. Write to the Secretary of the Interior for record in Department of the Interior, Washington, D. C. 2. To remove mildew stains from linen soak the article in buttermilk and spread on the grass in the sun. If a damp closet or sideboard causes mildew, place in it a saucer of quicklime. It will absorb the dampness and disinfect the space. Mildew may be removed also by rubbing the stained parts with lard, then spread in the sun every day for a week, being careful to bring it in every night and whenever it rains. Wash in the usual way. 3. King Leopold had several daughters, but in Belgium the crown descends in the male line, so it went to a nephew. King Leopold's second marriage was morganatic; that is, with a woman not of royal rank. In a marriage of this kind neither the wife nor the children can inherit the rank or possessions of the father, though the children are legitimate; consequently Leopold's two sons by his second marriage have no claim on the throne. King Leopold made ample provision for his wife and children.

Mrs. R. S. N., Clarksburg, W. Va. At what age should a child begin to receive discipline?

The modern idea of child training is that discipline should begin with life itself. In the New York Babies' Hospital it is said that there is never any crying among the well babies. They are fed and bathed regularly, and then laid on beds. They learn in the very beginning that crying does no good, so they take quiet whatever comes. As they grow older, the same firm, healthful policy is pursued. They are permitted certain things and forbidden others. As long as they are well, there is no trouble about discipline. A very young child knows when it is doing wrong, and modes of discipline must be devised from the very first for punishing lapses from obedience.

W. F. D., Columbus, O. How does the promise to Isaac have any relation to us, either as the state or in the church?

You will find the promise in Gen. 26:3, especially the last portion of the fourth verse. He had succeeded to his patrimonial inheritance and was also now to receive a renewal of the different promises which had been given to his father, with the additional assurance that through him, all the nations of the earth should be blessed. Except by an extremely attenuated process of reasoning, we can go no further in pointing out a connection between Isaac and ourselves than is indicated in the Bible itself. There are probably some preachers who may be able to do so. The whole world is benefited through the promises to the patriarchs. (Repeat definitely the question concerning Ishmael and if we can answer we will do so.)

E. K., Eugene, Ore. Is there any Protestant church that will not allow a divorced person to marry again as long as the other party is living?

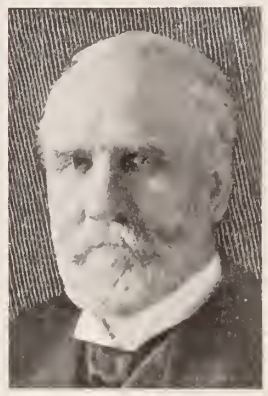
The Protestant Episcopal Church is trying to prevent the remarriage of divorced persons by its clergy, and other Protestant churches are frowning on the practice, except in the case of the innocent party.

J. H. Y., Leola, Pa. Sunday School pupils asked the following: 1. What did they do with the bodies of the two thieves who were crucified with Christ? 2. Was any one else ever laid in the sepulchre from whence Christ arose?

1. Legend gives them the names of Dismas and Gestas. Scripture says nothing regarding the disposition of their bodies, but they were probably interred in the potter's field or in ground reserved for criminal sepulture, or taken away by their friends for burial elsewhere. 2. It belonged to Joseph of Arimathea and no one had been buried there until Christ was laid in it. There is no record of any other interment, and there probably has been no other. The Jews would not have used it. It has been so venerated by all other races that they would not have profaned it by burial there.

Famous Christian Testimonies

PROBABLY no man, apart from the occupant of the Presidential chair, is better known throughout the length and breadth of this land than the Hon. James Wilson, the venerable Secretary of the Department of Agriculture. Secretary Wilson, though now in his seventy-fifth year, is still remarkably hale and vigorous and is rightly regarded as one of the best authorities on this continent, if not in the world, on scientific farming, stock raising and the various questions that relate to food production. In his long career, which includes nearly fifty years of public service, the Secretary has enjoyed unusual opportunities of coming in contact with leading men representing all kinds of business and every shade of opinion. He has marked the development of the religious spirit in the nation. To the Honorable Secretary a request was sent for an answer to the question:



Hon. James Wilson

"Is the spirit of Jesus more dominant in business and public affairs than when you entered active life, and is it an advantage or not for a public man to-day to be known as a professing Christian?"

Secretary Wilson's reply is given below, and, like everything else from his pen, it is concise, yet sufficiently comprehensive and straight to the point at issue. He writes:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY

Dear Sir: Washington, D. C., December 14, 1909.

Replying to your letter of December 8, would say that the progress of international arbitration and the world-wide activities of the Red Cross, seem to me to show that the world is improving in its international relations. I believe that our own people in the United States are learning to know one another better and to love one another more. Sectionalism is vanishing, and sectarianism is losing its bitterness. There are more people in Church and Sunday School than ever before.

Most of your questions you can answer better than I can. As to men in public life, I believe that the public man is apt to reflect the people who place him in a public position.

Very truly yours,

James Wilson

Secretary.

Miscellaneous

N. M. B., a reader in New Orleans, writes that our beautiful "Dreamland" child picture is, by some strange coincidence, a lifelike portrait of his little child and has been so recognized by a number of acquaintances. His little one passed away some time ago.

J. C. W., Toronto, Canada. We are warned in Scripture that many false prophets and teachers will arise in the latter days and deceive the very elect, etc. This would seem to apply in the present case. No one has authority to dogmatize on such subjects.

Mrs. P. G., Spirit Lake, Ia. Swedenborg was a mystic. He believed he had "revelations" and that he enjoyed the view of the spiritual world and conversed with spirits and angels. He was the founder of the "New Jerusalem" Church, but did not attempt to organize congregations.

G. I., Poestenkill, N. Y. Under the Old Testament dispensation, capital punishment was unquestionably recognized. Under the Gospel dispensation, however, the value of a human life, the call of mercy, and the duty of leaving ultimate judgment with God are clearly set forth.

C. O. B., Troutdale, Ore. 1. The only light we have on the subject is that found in the Scripture itself. See John 5:28, 29; I. Cor. 15; Rev. 20:11-15. Many preachers and writers have speculated on these passages. The subject is too extensive to discuss here. 2. It is assumed by some early writers as a reasonable probability that John was baptized by some of his own disciples. It is not known who baptized the apostles.

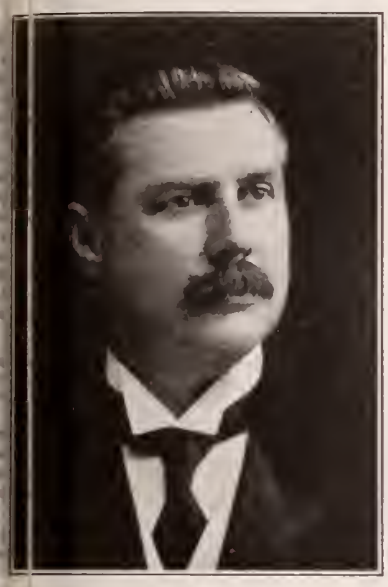
H. D. J., Allentown, Mo. 1. One may be a moralist and yet no Christian. He may have excellent qualities of heart, head and character generally and yet be no Christian. In pagan times there were many admirable characters who knew nothing of the Gospel. The virtues you mention are all excellent in their way, and are such as Epictetus, Plato and Socrates would have praised. Some of them are purely intellectual, others are in the domain of the heart and the affections. 2. The prefixes, as you write them, are not good English, with two exceptions, viz., unveracity and uncandid. A better word for the last would be disingenuous.

The Church and Temperance

By Professor Charles Scanlon, Secretary of the Presbyterian Temperance Committee

SINCE the angel with the flaming sword stood at the gates of Eden history does not record an instance where vice and virtue, evil and good, falsehood and truth, hate and love, wrong and right, met more squarely face to face than when the legalized liquor traffic confronts the church of the living God and demands the right to live.

What right have Christian people anywhere to acquiesce in the perpetuation of an institution which is so unmitigatedly bad, so incurably evil, so atrociously wicked, so diametrically opposed to all good as the liquor traffic



Professor Charles Scanlon
Secretary of Presbyterian Temperance Committee is always and everywhere known to be. By the love of God's day and God's Book and God's house and God's people and God's honor, by every instinct of self-preservation the church is in duty bound to aim at nothing less than the utter destruction of this Beast of the bottle. Whenever any evil tends to neutralize the influence of the Gospel, and blocks the way to the sanctuary as this evil does, that moment ought the church to lay violent hands upon it, whether it be moral, social financial or political.

In dealing with this thing the church must not condone, nor excuse, nor evade, nor apologize, nor compromise, nor be silent; she must smite to kill. If the church is right, the liquor traffic is wrong. Christ did not say that he came to regulate the works of the devil, but to destroy them, and it is enough for Christians that they be as their Lord.

To say that the church shall take no part in the temperance reform is to say that there shall be no such reform; and to say there shall be no temperance reform is to say that, sooner or later, there will be no church; and to say there will be no church is to say there will be no Christian civilization.

When it can be shown that the Inquisition was right, and that Nero was good; that Pilate was just and Herod was pure; that Leonidas was a traitor and Benedict Arnold a patriot; that infidel anarchy is better than responsible Christian government; that the plague is a blessing and the decalogue a curse; then, perhaps, but not until then, can it be shown that it is wise to build jails and penitentiaries, and asylums and almshouses, and hospitals and orphanages, and license liquor dealers to populate them. Then will it be statesmanship to maintain a national quarantine against idiots, paupers, criminals and lunatics from abroad, and license 250,000 saloonkeepers to manufacture that kind of a product at home. Then will it be economy to levy taxes to support orphans and widows and license the murder of husbands and fathers. Then will it be good to maintain 275 lifesaving stations, at a million and a half, and under the same flag and out of the same pockets maintain 250,000 life-destroying stations at two billions and a half.

Oh, church of the living God, thou who hast been set as a watchman on the wall, cry aloud, and warn this nation that he who smote Egypt and Greece and Rome for their corruption, and Judah for her idolatry, and Venice for her pride, and Spain for her avarice, will not hold us guiltless if we do these things! Oh, Church of Christ, thou who oughtest always to be in the van of God's marching squadrons, cry out, and tell our people that he who watched over us in infancy and has run with us in battle now demands that we shall purge our land of this curse, and that the dramshop must be consigned to the museum of the past, with the rack, the thumb-screw, the scalping knife, the tomahawk, the pirate ship, the Inquisition, and other relics of barbarism, while the noblest aspirations of a noble people are embodied in the noblest laws of noblest men.

ADVERTISERS WHO MAKE GOOD

ON page 280 of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD you will find an article entitled "Investigating Bond Issues," in which is described the great amount of trouble and expense to which first-class bond houses go in ascertaining the real worth of securities before offering them for sale to the public.

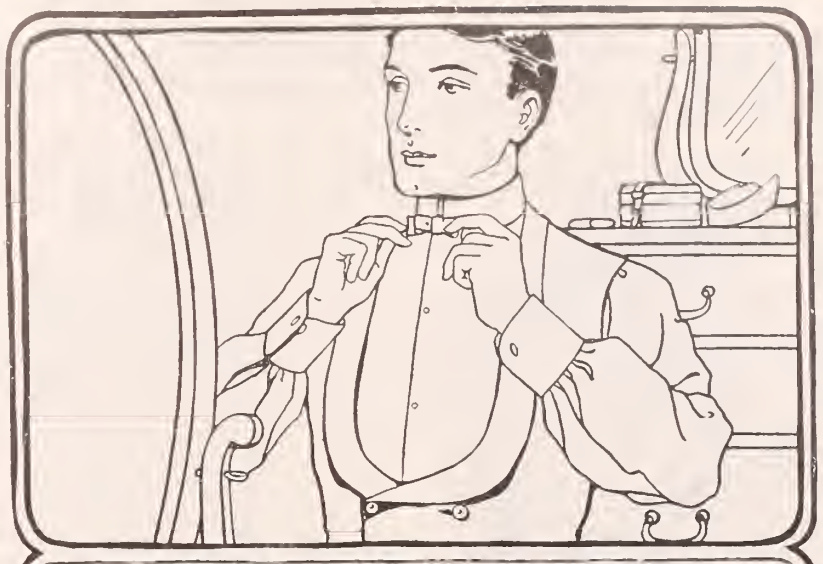
The reputations of such houses depend upon their judgment, and, as stated in the article, a banker would sooner reclaim a whole issue of bonds at great loss than have his judgment impeached, two houses having recently reclaimed bonds in this way to the extent of one million dollars.

But this attitude is by no means confined to financial advertisers. Since beginning this series of talks we have been called upon to adjust several points of difference which have arisen between subscribers and advertisers, and we have been struck by the eagerness of advertisers to make good every claim made by them in print.

As a matter of fact, the advertiser is as much dependent upon the customer who "comes back" as any local dealer. He simply cannot afford to have any dissatisfied patrons, but it sometimes happens that through no fault of the advertiser's own the subscriber may hold him very much at fault. He may be swamped with orders, or the mails may miscarry, or the express company may not deliver the goods on time. Neither the subscriber nor the advertiser may know of this, and so counter-claims are set up, and sometimes a subscriber retires from the field without having obtained his rights.

This, however, is not necessary. A little adjustment sets the matter right, and we are happy to say that both our subscribers and advertisers are coming to a better understanding of one another than existed heretofore, for both realize that we are ready to go to the furthest extent in fulfilling the spirit as well as the letter of our guarantee, which is as follows:

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD guarantees its advertisements. Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within one month of the date of the appearance of the advertisement.



Here is a young fellow whose face, hands, body and linen are kept clean by the use of Ivory Soap.

Of what other soap can it be said that it is equally valuable for toilet, bath and fine laundry purposes?

Some soaps are good for one thing; some for another. But with Ivory Soap you can cleanse ANYthing or ANYbody —yourself; your baby; a white waistcoat or a piece of lace. The daintier the thing is, the more necessary it is that you use Ivory Soap.

Purity is the essential in soap. And Ivory Soap is pure—infinitely purer than any laundry soap; purer than many "toilet" soaps which sell for ten times its price.

Ivory Soap . . . 99 44/100 Per Cent. Pure.

A Tale of Colonial Days in Old New York

By AMELIA E. BARR

CHAPTER NINE—Continued

"WELL, then?" said Katrina.

"The sailor men thought fighting the best way," said Batavius, "and shouting, 'Captain Van Vroom to the rescue!' they went all through the city. They did not shout for me; they knew I would not lead them into such foolishness."

"But a brave man is our Captain, and one brave man knows another."

"At that hour, mother, he was a crazy man, and I could no more hold him than I could hold an armful of water."

"Crazy! Choose thy words better, Batavius."

"Well, then, at his age——"

"One thing I can tell thee, Batavius," interrupted the Captain; "at that hour, just twenty years old I felt. With those brave fellows behind me, I could have got into any ship." And as he spoke, Madame said in her sweetest, tenderest voice:

"A great soul thou art. And from any ship thou would have brought the Stamps, if the little souls would have let thee; Katrina knows that."

"And the consequences, mother? What of the consequences? Forgetting them is improper—and dangerous."

"My Jan never counts the danger, Batavius."

"You see, mother, you see, we must be reasonable; all the men of position and influence say that. I can tell you that even General Gage is most anxious to prevent anything like an overt act."

"Tired am I of those two words. What does the government call the things we have been doing these many months?"

"Rioting, only rioting; but bloodshed means war."

"Well, then, I stand with my Jan and the sailors. I would give the government an overt act, just as quick as I could."

"You talk like a woman. Every one who rushes into useless danger is a fool."

"A woman I am, but no fool. Yet I would have gone with the sailor men for the Stamps."

"Very easily that is seen, mother. But it might have been destruction of the city."

"Tush! Nothing of the kind. But I will tell thee how it is—people listen to lawyers and to what they call men of weight and influence, and very cautious are such men; they have offices to lose, and property that may be destroyed, and——"

"Yes, to such men I listen; that is my way; it is a sacred principle with me, for they give good advice."

"It is your business, that is what you mean."

"Well, then, my business it is. I am very anxious and particular about my business. On many Exchanges I am known for possessing a sound judgment. But so!" And he shrugged his big shoulders to indicate the hopelessness of sound judgment from Madame.

"If you had asked the poor citizens, or the Liberty Boys——"

"The poor men and the Liberty Boys had their say, and it is a great satisfaction for me to find that generally they think as I do. I will tell you, that when John Cruger failed with a crowd he was talking to, old Zebedee Willis won them with a few words. He stood up in his leather apron, and he had his paper cap on his head, and his big awl in his hand, and he said, 'Boys, not one man of us in fifty can climb into a boat joggling about on the river, but we can every man Jack of us get into the fort. For one, I'll be eternally obliged to Cadwallader Colden if he will put the bits of paper in the fort; they'll be mighty convenient to us there'; and the crowd that would not listen to Cruger's reasonable arguments, were delighted with old Zebedee's view of the case."

Madame did not answer Batavius. She was getting Jan his slippers, and whispering kind little words as she did so. "I will go and get thee some pie, Jan."

"Thou good Katrina!"

"And I will call Virginia, and tell her to come to see thee." Then turning to Batavius she added, "See thou tease her not, Batavius; a very bad headache she had an hour ago."

"A great many times, mother, she has had a headache—that is not very interesting to me."

"She is not well this short time gone."

"I can see that myself. When we are married, no more headache she will have."

"Perhaps."

"Surely. I shall see to that."

And Katrina looked steadily into the face of Virginia's lover, and her eyes were opened, and she saw, as it were, in a flash of light, a miraculous glimpse of the real man; saw, or rather divined, the craven compromises, the sullen vanities, the secret brutalities, and unmanly dreams of revenge that lurked beneath the plausible, ordinary merits so visible to all.

For a moment she was astonished, but this feeling was quickly followed by one of anger, and she went hastily to her daughter's room. Then the sight of Virginia silently weeping as she stitched the band of linen in her hand turned her anger into pity. She went to her child's side, and stroked her pretty brown hair, and lifted her hand and caressed it.

"My dear one," she said, "thy father has come home, and a great deed he would have done this morning, if his own way he might have had."

"But what then?"

"I will tell thee. The sailors idle in harbor wanted to board the government sloop and destroy the Stamps, and they went through the street calling for thy father to lead them. And he was glad, and ready to go with the men, but the citizens would not have it so. They were afraid of bloodshed and civil war. Little spirit have they, I think. Batavius also was against thy father; that was because he would have been shamed into going with the Captain."

"Indeed no, moeder. Batavius would take his stand with the rich and respectable citizens. Many reasons, old and new, he would have ready for not going with his Captain and mates."

"Batavius is a coward."

"Batavius is a bad, cruel man; a coward he is not. My fader says he is a fierce fighter."

"For his life, or his ships, or his goods, Batavius will fight. But for freedom, and free men's rights, and for the rights of men and women not yet born, Batavius has no stomach for fighting. I say he is a selfish coward. Now make thyself pretty, and be very kind to thy father, and praise him a great deal, and thou need not praise Batavius at all—and thou need not be very pleasant to him. I know very well that he has been praising himself, and his great moderation, to John Watts, and the rest of the Worshipfuls. I know also that he has spoken with pity of thy father's rashness, and his own trouble in managing thy father. I know! I know! I wish, then, that some one should make him shrink and shrivel to his own size. On thy father he builds himself."

'What does Batavius know of my od father's feelings and reasons?"

'He knows as much as a cheese-mite ows of the cheesemonger. That is Now make some haste, and what-r is thy best mood show thyself in i'

Virginia hardly needed this charge. Ir mother's words had filled her with spirit contradictory, provoking, and ogether charming. She bathed her fe, and put on her best gray bodice, ed with blue ribbons, and a bow of be ribbon in her hair, and a long c in of gold beads, which Batavius hl given her, round her throat, and t s arrayed to tease or to conquer, s went slowly down the long stair-w, singing as she went—

The pretty maid who cries aloud,
Sweet Lilies of the Valley!

he sang the last line twice over as s opened the door, then with a low lgh of delight she ran to her father. "i, my fader! my fader!" she cried. "i great a spirit is in thy good heart! I ave heard tell! Yes, indeed! every o talks of thy courage. Thou art so yng, and so handsome, and so brave, th if a wife thou wanted to-day the ptiest girls in New York would sile on thee." And she kissed him, a put her arms across his shoulder, a kissed him again, and again, and th as she sat down by his side, she fod time to send Batavius a ravish-in smile of recognizance, and to svetly ask him to "tell her all about h father's brave intent."

Indeed, my Virginia, as I have al-rdy told thy father, the intent was ra, not brave. I do not believe the Sps could have been got; and, say th could, of what use at all would such a victory be? More Stamps are looked for every day, and more, and still more; an endless fight without any good results."

"But yet you stood with your Captain and your mates? Oh, I am sure of that, Batavius."

"I was not with them, my Virginia."

"Oh, dear! I am disappointed in you! Think of a sailor deserting his Captain and his comrades, and siding with a lot of cowardly landsmen. I thought sailors stood by sailors, right or wrong."

"They ought to," growled Jansen.

"I thought it was always 'one and all' with the men of the sea. Oh, Batavius, I am astonished! I am even ashamed of you. My father would have stood by you, if the sailors had shouted, 'Batavius to the rescue!' To the hilt of his cutlass he would have stood by you—yes, to the bottom of the sea—and that, principle or no principle. Batavius! Batavius! I do not believe you will ever again be able to get a crew for The Arms of Stuyvesant."

"My lovely one, there is no fear of that. I shall tell them I am Van Vroom's son-in-law. They will hire with me, for your sake. Your family name will find me a crew," and he waggled his head in a mockery of assurance.

She made a positive motion of denial, and added, "You would only be a relation by marriage. That is not much of a tie."

"Strongest tie in the world," he answered.

"But for business, it is not worth anything. Say you wanted money—you would not like to go to John Cruger, to borrow it, because you were Captain Van Vroom's son-in-law. Cruger would laugh at you, and——"

"I do not want money. I borrow from no one."

"Well, then, say you hired men on my father's name; they would not obey you."

"Would they not? Little you know, my beauty. They would obey me on their hands and knees. That is a pretty chain you are wearing."

"You gave it to me. Thank you! thank you! thank you, Batavius! I think I have said 'thank you' twenty-three time before; now the number is twenty-six."

And her smile was so charming, her pretty little balances and movements from foot to foot so fascinating, and the mimicry and intonations of her words so provoking and alluring, that Batavius was at her mercy. He adored and he hated her. He wished both to kiss and to strike her. She bewitched and she tortured him. Involuntarily he rose and attempted to embrace her—and she slipped into her father's arms.

"You are—you are the—the most provoking of women," he muttered—and then the outside door opened, and Arent and Harry Rutgers entered.

It was such a climax as Virginia most desired. She could now torment Batavius in a threefold manner, and with all the grace of girlhood, happy and unrestrained, she stepped forward to meet her brother and her friend.

"Have you a letter for me, Harry?" she asked. "Come, now, I know you have. Shall I pick your pocket for it, or will you deliver it at once, sir?"

"Here is the letter, Virginia. I received it only one hour ago."

"I expected it. How delightful! It is from Lady Rose. Now you must all excuse my inattention. Nothing can be said until I have read my letter;" and then, happening to glance at Arent, she saw such a wonderful happiness and composure in his smiling face that she knew without a word, or look of confession, that Arent had a similar white paper comforter lying somewhere close to his heart.

The home Poultry-Raising Course of the International Correspondence Schools is the first and last word on Successful Poultry Raising. Gives the beginner a better knowledge than the old-timer. Shows you how to raise poultry in the city, suburbs or country, and how to make money from the start, and on small investment.

YOU LEARN AT HOME

This Course represents the work of the most expert and successful Poultry Raisers in the world, and explains how to select most profitable breeds; feeding; marketing eggs and poultry for profit; natural and artificial brooding; natural and artificial incubation; laying hens; combination plant; poultry appliances; enemies of poultry; diseases of poultry; poultry houses and management; turkeys; water fowls; squabs, etc., etc. For full information fill in and mail the attached coupon to-day.

Proof of the value of this Course is the fact that the I. C. S. is associated with the largest egg farm in the world—the Rancocas Farm at Brown's Mills, in-the-Pines, N. J.—famous for Rancocas Leghorns and DAY-OLD CHIX. This farm contains 10,000 layers—hatches 1200 chickens daily—markets 30,000 eggs weekly. Farm always open and expert demonstrators always on the ground.

This is the Course for which the whole Poultry-Raising world has been waiting. For free circular fully describing it, fill in and mail the attached coupon.

A Reader's Beautiful Gift

MISS MARGARET GERTRUDE WICK, of Harrisville, Pa., a reader of this journal, recently passed away. For the last sixteen years she had been an invalid. She was a very patient sufferer, thoughtful and kind to all around her, and she remembered in her gifts the poor and the afflicted. During her long period of suffering she wrote many devotional poems and, having musical talent, set them to fitting melodies, a number of which have been rendered in public with marked acceptance. She was a consistent Christian and devoted to the Presbyterian Church, of which she was a life-long member. She left a portion of her estate to foreign and home missionary work and she bequeathed to our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, for the endowment of two memorial cots in memory of her father and mother, $250, and $150 to the Bowery Mission. She gave to the Presbyterian Church, of Harrisville, $1,500; to the Boys' Industrial Home, Oakdale, $250; to the Almira Home for

The Late Miss Margaret Wick

Aged Women, Newcastle, Pa., $250; to the Presbyterian Sabbath School Association work, $1,000, and to Presbyterian foreign missionary work $1,000. These are only a few of her very liberal bequests in aid of Gospel propagation and general benevolence.

One who knew her writes of this godly woman: "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and so it seemed. Under the Father's discipline, she grew into the image of her Lord who redeemed her, and who called her but a little while ago into the life eternal. She had a heart for every holy ministry of the church. Her heart was tender and pitiful and her hand always open. In her sympathy for others, she forgot herself. Being dead, her voice will yet speak." The body of this invalid saint was laid to rest in Harrisville Cemetery.

From a Farmer's Wife

Dear Mr. Editor: I have now received the fifth issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which was subscribed for me by our friend, Mr. W. L. Ames; also, the calendar and "Daughters of Dorcas." My life is that of a farmer's wife, and we farmers have not much society or reading, but THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gives the principal subjects of the day in such condensed form that one can read an article or item while doing some little household duty. I am especially fond of the queries of THE MAIL-BAG, for much useful knowledge is contained therein. We are young people, just "starting out" in married life, but THE CHRISTIAN HERALD shall always be a guest in our home. MRS. FRED DENISON.

Are You Well?

Have You a Good Figure?

You can surprise your husband and friends by giving 15 minutes a day, in your room, to special directions which I give you to strengthen vital organs and nerves, so you are relieved of chronic ailments. Your body can be rounded and you can have as good a figure, as gracefully carried, as any woman of your acquaintance.

A pupil who was thin writes me:

"I just can't tell you how happy I am! I wore low neck and short sleeves the other night and I was so proud of my neck and arms! My busts are rounded out and I have gained 28 pounds; it has come just where I wanted it and I carry myself like another woman. My old dresses look stylish on me now. You remember I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. I guess my stomach must be stronger too, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested. I feel as if I had missed so much enjoyment in life, for I never did have such good times before. I feel so well all the time."

I have built up thousands of women why not you? Write me, and if I cannot help your particular case I will tell you so.

I give each pupil the individual, confidential treatment which her case demands.

THE YOKE OF CHRIST*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

WE are apt to think of the yoke as an instrument of torture, and the impression is strengthened when we look at the galled necks and shoulders of oxen that bear the yoke as they work. And so the yoke is sometimes considered as an appropriate emblem of subjection and slavery, imprisonment and severe rule, while the removal of it is indicative of deliverance.

How different is the yoke of Christ! He said, "Take my yoke upon you, and ye shall find rest." That is a yoke that never galls. In our collection we have a yoke which is heavily cushioned. It is designed to be worn when carrying a boat on the shoulders, over the head, across "carries," between lakes in the Adirondack region. The yoke of Christ is made soft and easy by being heavily cushioned with love. Instead of being an emblem of slavery the yoke of Christ is an emblem of fellowship. He invites us to put it on ourselves; no one can put it on for us, not even Christ, but we are privileged to wear it that Christ may become our helper. Let us think what it means to be a yoke-fellow with Christ. He says to us: "If you are finding your life a heavy burden, let me share it with you. I will rest you. I will teach you how to live in gentleness and kindness. I will take the worry out of your hearts." When Jesus says to us that he will give us rest, do not let us misunderstand him and think we are to be relieved from toil.

Rest is not quitting the busy career;
Rest is the fitting of self to its sphere.
'Tis loving and serving the highest and best,
'Tis onwards! unswerving, and that is true rest.
—J. S. DWIGHT.

What Jesus will give us is rest in work, not rest from work—not idleness. Work is one of our greatest blessings, but we must learn from Christ how to work in the right way, how to work without worry, how to bear life's burdens without anxiety.

In recent years a torpedo-boat has been invented which may be submerged for many hours, and its occupants yet be safe. On one occasion such a boat was under water for twenty-four hours; during that time a severe storm had raged, lashing the waves into fury, but when the torpedo-boat was raised those in it knew nothing about the storm, for they had been down, down, down, where the ocean was at peace. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee." The thought is the same, whether in the boat with Christ or in the yoke with him.

Two lady travelers in Egypt were standing at the reputed spot by the Nile where Moses was said to have been hidden in the rushes by his mother. Even more interesting to them was a woman about fifty years of age, ascending a long stone stairway with a tub of water upon her head. In her form there was not a suspicion of being bowed down; on the contrary, she bore herself erectly and moved steadily and spilled not a drop of water. How admirably she carried her burden! It suggested to those looking at her how bravely and steadfastly life's burdens should be carried in the strength which Christ will give us. Undoubtedly the woman who carried the tub of water so admirably on her head had been trained from childhood to carry burdens in that way, beginning with something not very heavy. So should our children be early taught to bear with equanimity the disappointments and unpleasant things which will, without doubt, come into their daily lives, to bear them through Christ that strengtheneth them.

Come unto me, ye who are heavy laden,
Come unto me, ye who are sore oppressed,
The white haired sire, the young and tender maiden,
Come unto me, and I will give you rest.

A certain queen was sitting for her portrait, and she requested that it should be painted without shadows. The astonished artist exclaimed: "I am afraid that your majesty is not acquainted with the laws of light. There can be no good portrait without shading." And so there can be no grand, noble life without sorrows. What we call "clouds" in our experience are as necessary to our soul life as shadows are to a picture.

Sometimes in such hours of trial those who thought themselves to be Christians have shown themselves to be quite like atheists. A lady observing her husband to be deeply dejected on account of some misfortune, pretended to be still more disconsolate than he, and gave way to lamentations and tears. As she had before exhorted him to dismiss his sorrow, he was astonished and asked the cause of her sudden grief. She replied that she had been dreaming; and it seemed to her that a messenger had come from heaven, and brought the news that God was dead, and that all of the angels were weeping. "Foolish woman!" said the husband. "You know right well that God cannot die!" "Indeed," replied the wife, "and if that be so certain, how comes it that you are now indulging your sorrow as immoderately as if he did not now exist?" That settled the matter, for the husband allowed himself to be encouraged in God.

The traveler may stand to-day in the city of Antwerp, in Belgium, near the old cathedral, hearing all the clatter of business, a thousand feet trampling up close to the walls and buttresses against which lean the booths where articles of all sorts are being sold, a thousand tongues rattling the language of traffic, when, as the hour strikes from above, a shower of notes descend from the spire; bell notes, fine, sweet, small as a bird's warble, the whole air full of crisp tinklings, underlaid by the deeper and sonorous tunes of large bells, but all of them pouring forth a melody that seems unearthly, and the more so because in such contrast with the scenes of common life beneath. So, amid the busy hum and stir of life, there come to the prayerful soul angelic voices of encouragement and warning, calling our thoughts upward to the God of peace, bell notes of promise and hope, words on which our souls can rest.

A little child was once obliged to have a painful operation performed. Her father took her in his arms, and explained to her that it was best and would save her a great deal of suffering by and by and prevent her from becoming a cripple. The child believed that the father knew best, and she said: "Stay right by me, papa, and hold my hand and I can bear it." And the father did so, and whispered: "Be brave, my darling; it will soon be over." And God is watching over us, and is close beside us, though we do not see him. Let us comfort ourselves in him and be brave. Let us hear him say: "Nothing can separate you from my love. In life I am always with you, and in death you will only be coming a little closer, when you can see me as I see you."

Dr. George H. Pentecost tells about going to call upon a parishioner who was in deep affliction. He found her working upon a sofa pillow. He asked

BLACK AND RICH

IS THE WAY POSTUM SHOULD BE

A liquid food that will help a person break a bad habit is worth knowing of. The president of one of the state associations of the W. C. T. U., who naturally does not want her name given, writes as follows:

"Whenever I was obliged to go without coffee for breakfast a dull, distracting headache would come on before noon. I discovered that, in reality, the nerves were crying out for their accustomed stimulant.

"At evening dinner I had been taught by experience that I must refrain from coffee or pass a sleepless night. While visiting a physician and his wife I was served with a most excellent beverage at their dainty and elegant table and, upon inquiry, discovered that this charming beverage was Postum and that the family had been greatly benefited by leaving off coffee and using Postum.

"I was so in love with it, and so pleased with the glimpse of freedom from my one bondage of habit and so thoroughly convinced that I ought to break with my captor, that upon my return home I at once began the use of Postum and have continued it ever since.

"I don't know what sick headache is now, and my nerves are steady and I sleep sound, generally eight hours. I used to become bilious frequently and required physic; now seldom ever have that experience.

"I have learned that long boiling is absolutely essential to furnish good Postum. That makes it clear, black and rich as any Mocha and Java blend. Please withhold my name, but you may use the letter for the good it may do."

Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Investigating Bond Issues

THE small investor, who is troubled with the question of the safety of this or that proposition, will be saved much worry by considering only those investments which are guaranteed by first-class houses. For, no matter what sources of information the private investor may have, they cannot possibly be as far reaching as those of the banker, whose business depends upon the accuracy of his knowledge of securities.

In the matter of bonds, for instance, a house of national reputation would rather recall an issue of bonds, at whatever expense, than have its judgment impeached. We have heard of two instances lately where series of bonds, issued by first-class houses, were recalled and the money, more than half a million dollars in each case, refunded to small investors throughout the country.

Good bond houses very naturally do their utmost to guard against such a possibility of loss, but the extent to which they go is hardly realized even by experienced investors. For instance, a well known bond house recently conducted an investigation of a bond issue, which it was asked to handle for three connecting interurban trolley roads in the Middle West.

Experts Called In

Now, instead of accepting the bond issue upon the word of the promoter, the bond house made a careful study of the proposition from the figures which were submitted in advance, and even from those figures decided that the earnings as reported were not large enough to support a bond issue of the size contemplated, for this house insists not only that the earnings shall be big enough to pay the interest upon the bonds, but that there shall be a very large margin beyond the necessary amount. Then an expert was sent to examine the roads personally, and to determine, if possible, just how large a bond issue was desirable. This expert spent two weeks riding over the roads in an endeavor to become intimately acquainted with them, and the result of his examination was a suggestion to consolidate the three roads and cut down the bond issue very materially. This suggestion being accepted favorably by the companies, the bond house employed a firm of chartered accountants to examine the books of the roads from the time they were first operated, up to date. The report of the accountants was then compared with the statement which had been submitted by the companies.

Next, an engineering firm was employed to make a physical examination of the roads, to determine the present value of the properties and to examine the actual state of the rails, ties, rock ballast, cars, copper in the trolley wire, trolley poles, power houses, and, in short, everything necessary to the operation of the roads. This firm was not only required to submit an estimate of the amount of expense necessary to keep up the roads in their existing state of maintenance, but also to submit another estimate showing how much it would cost to replace all of the property of the roads, new, at the prevailing market rate.

External Considerations

Next, an expert was asked to submit a report based on the earnings of the road in the past, and to make a calculation upon the probable earnings in the future, based on the character of the surrounding country and its development as compared with adjacent sections. Was the section of the country through which the road passed growing, and, if so, at what rate? Also, how was this growth likely to be affected by external conditions?

After all these reports had been received by the bond house they were submitted to experts, to be analyzed and compared in detail with other properties which had been financed not only by this bond house, but by other concerns of a similar character. The engineer's report was examined to see if it agreed with the accountant's report, and these in turn were compared with the report which had been submitted by the promoter of the product.

Any differences had to be explained, and, if necessary, the investigations made over again, because it sometimes happens that a difference in a report is due to mistakes honestly made. The promoter may have underestimated the salaries necessary to carry on the road under modern conditions, or wrong estimates may have been made in the matter of the expense of maintenance. Nearly six months were required before the whole investigation was completed, but at the end of that time the bond house decided that it could safely recommend to its customers an issue of bonds upon the consolidated road.

Controlling the Market Price

Having then determined to handle the issue of bonds for the company, it was further exacted that every one of the bonds of the issue was to be handled by the bond house in question. Good bond houses always exact this condition, for the reason that they are then able to control the market price of the bonds. Instances have been known where bond houses have taken only part of an issue of bonds. In one case part of a bond issue was given to a contractor in payment for construction work. The market price of the bonds was $100, but the contractor in his eagerness to obtain ready money sold his share of the issue in open market at $90, which then became the market price of the bonds and above which it was impossible to sell that part of the issue which had been taken over by the bond house.

And so it will be seen that there are danger points to be considered in a bond issue which could not possibly be covered by the individual investigator. Not only does the process require the most expert knowledge, but it is highly expensive. Hence the small investor at least will do well to consider only those bonds which are offered by a reputable bond house. The fact that such a house issues them is a guarantee that an investigation similar to that described above has been carried out, and the investor has the further assurance that if, through some unforeseen contingency, the issue should fail, he will be protected by the bond house from which he has purchased the securities.

A New Map of the World

THE new international map of the world, as described by the National Geographic Magazine, is to be drawn on a scale of one to one million. That is, any length measured is to be one-millionth part of the distance between the same two points measured on the ground. In English measure, this is equivalent to sixteen miles to the inch. The international map of the world now in preparation was first proposed by Professor Albrecht Penck, of the University of Berlin. A committee representing ten different countries, two from each country, are supervising its production, the American members being Mr. Mendenhall, of the Coast Survey, and Major Powell, of the Geographical Survey. The spelling on the map will be according to the pronunciation of the names of places familiar to the countries where these places are located. The entire atlas will contain about 1,500 sheets.

The City Yoked With Christ

There is an old saying that "God de the country, and man made the tvn." Certain it is that the country pure, healthy and beautiful, while town is often quite the opposite. hen the Lord Jesus did many of his ghty works in the towns and cities linked himself with them, and when bewailed their lack of co-operation the words, "Woe unto thee, Chora-

; woe unto Bethsaida, and thou, Capernaum," he showed his desire was t not only individuals, but cities, ould come unto him and learn of him d secure peace.

What Christ Said

I said: "Let me walk in the fields."
He said: "No, walk in the town."
I said: "There are no flowers there."
He said: "No flowers, but a crown."

I said: "But the skies are black;
There is nothing but noise and din."
And he wept as he sent me back—
"There is more," he said; "there is sin."

GEORGE MACDONALD.

The battle is on for making our cities at God would have them be. In his me laws are made for the protection of the Sabbath; laws for the otection of young children against rd labor, against the contaminating luence of the streets after nightfall; ainst the putting up of corrupting b-posters; against the saloons. Publ playgrounds are sustained in many ces as centres of happiness, good rals and human brotherhood. Children who play together are not likely t grow up to hate and oppress each o er. This will be doubly true if they o attend the day school and the Sunday School. Dr. Alexander McKenz has said: "It is clear that the Holy Cy must be brought down by men vo are holy, pure and of a ministeri disposition. Now it is commonly orted that there are many men in o time which cannot be described in s h terms. There are a great many od men in the world. But it is not be denied that the common life is at onsiderable remove from the New Testament. There is an appalling ount of cleaning to be done before t city can stand squarely on the ound, but it can be done. Christian n have measureless strength when ty attempt measureless things. . . . Fch man (or person) can furnish one ne toward the city, for the foundati of the wall, or perchance for its c ing. To give himself is to give re than himself. Thus I set good c duct out of a good heart, honorable ing, daily obedience, the unostentatious usefulness high among the methods by which the city shall be builded down." An interesting illustration of how Christianity bettered things is afforded by the whole district around Mount Lebanon, which has been called "the oasis of the Turkish empire," because it has better farms, better roads, better houses, better social life than any other part of the Sultan's dominions. It is particularly wonderful that its farms on the rough mountain sides should yield larger crops than Samaria's fertile plains. The whole secret is the fact that Mount Lebanon, like the Waldensian hills of Italy, has been the refuge of persecuted Christians, who make up most of the population, and who can do better farming on the roughest hillsides than Mohammedans on fertile ground. The influence of the missionary schools and the Syrian Protestant College, at Beirut, have been and are to-day potent influences in yoking that region with Christ. Towns and cities and nations, as well as individuals, must be yoked with Christ. Why did Jesus say in his woes against cities that Chorazin, Bethsaida and Capernaum were more guilty than Tyre and Sodom? Sodom's sin we know was social vice. Any city of the present day that tolerates such conditions cannot be said to be yoked with Christ, but is all the while ministering to its own destruction. What a contrast we find in the Italian city of Florence, where, centuries ago, the citizens declared Christ the King of their city in a solemn civic service. They had a stone set up with the inscription on it: "Jesus Christ appointed by the Senate the King of the Florentines." Time has effaced that inscription, but there is a sacred monogram in its stead and on a tower is an inscription referring to that event which reads: "Jesus Christ, the King of Glory; He conquers, He reigns, He rules." Is Florence, then, the Holy City? For a time indeed she seemed to be, but alas! she did not remain yoked with Christ!

Methodists Render Tribute

AT the regular weekly meeting of Methodist pastors, held in New York City March 28, the following resolutions were adopted:

Whereas, Our beloved brother, Louis Klopsch, has been taken away by the hand of death; therefore, be it

Resolved, That in his removal Methodism has lost one of its most conspicuous, highly esteemed and influential members; the cause of our common Christianity one of its wisest, most consecrated and efficient advocates, and local and universal charities one of their most blessed benefactors.

Resolved, That we commend his unfaltering faith in the Bible, his intense love for the divine Christ as his personal Saviour, his belief in the witness of the Holy Spirit, and his devotion to the promotion of a warm evangelical Christianity.

Resolved, That we marvel and rejoice at the executive ability with which he was able to unite hundreds of thousands of hearts of kindred spirit and more than four millions of dollars in helping the poor, and children of the poor, in our own land, and in relieving instantly the suffering of the multitudes of most of the nations of the earth, which colossal benevolences were recognized by receptions and decorations of Kings and Emperors and by messages and flowers of love from the President of our own country, as well as by the tears and cheers of the penniless; and that we believe that Christ, the real King, who decorated his character with a cross, has placed on the brow of his faithful warrior, conqueror and child a crown of life.

Resolved, That we will cherish his memory and copy his example as he followed Christ, and rededicate our lives to the cause of truth, love and the salvation of our fellow-men.

Resolved, That we sympathize most deeply with and pray most sincerely for the wife and children of our dear brother; and that a copy of these resolutions be sent to the hereaved ones, and that a copy of them be spread upon the minutes of the meeting.

Signed by Rev. Ferdinand C. Iglehart, Rev. Frederick Shannon, Rev. George G. Vogel, Committee.

A Sixteen-Hour Meal in a Minute

It requires sixteen hours of soaking, boiling and baking to prepare a dish of home-baked beans.

It requires but a minute to serve a meal of Van Camp's. One can keep a dozen meals always ready. And, no matter when served, they are just as fresh as though they came direct from the oven.

Please think what that means, and how much more it will mean in hot weather.

Then Van Camp's are nut-like, mealy and whole. They are never crisped, never mushy or broken.

Van Camp's have the tomato sauce baked in, forming a delicious blend. And Van Camp's digest. They don't ferment and form gas, as home-baked beans usually do.

These differences are due to terrific heat—to the use of steam ovens—to facilities which homes don't have.

So Van Camp's, in addition to all their convenience, mean a doubly inviting dish.

The consumption of beans has trebled in the past five years. Last year millions of bushels were imported from Germany to help supply the demands.

This is partly due to the new way of baking—the use of steam ovens—which makes beans easy to digest. And it is partly due to the cost of meat. Beans contain even more nutrition than meat, and they cost but a third as much.

Van Camp's beans—which all people like—help immensely in solving the food problem.

The beans used in Van Camp's are picked out by hand from the choicest Michigan beans. They cost us four times what some beans would cost.

Our tomato sauce is made from whole, vine-ripened tomatoes to supply this sparkling zest. It costs us five times the market price of much tomato sauce.

If you want beans as good as they can be—beans which you can't serve too often—insist that you get this brand. (53)

Winning the World*

IN the reports of the great student conference at Rochester, N. Y., last January the reader must have been especially struck by the confidence expressed there.

Robert E. Speer told of his firm belief that the whole world would soon know and love Christ.

He dwelt especially upon the fact that the countries which embraced Christianity were not only better fitted thereby for spiritual progress, but they were physically far better fortified.

"People die by starvation," he said, "in countries where Christianity has not been taught. There are Hindu, Buddhist and Mohammedan famines, but has any one ever heard of a great Christian famine?"

This fact, of course, is due to many reasons; but perhaps chiefly to the training in intelligence which accompanies all Christian effort. The schoolhouse goes with the church. We are made to feel that the service of our Saviour requires the brightest mind and the keenest sense that can be developed; that we must be as wise as serpents, while we are also as harmless as doves.

It seems as though, where so much of our commerce is going to the great pagan nations of China and India, our intellectual and spiritual privileges must surely follow soon.

At this same convention Dr. Arthur J. Brown reported that a Chinese tailor made him an overcoat of English cloth, on an American sewing machine. He traveled in a car made in Wilmington, Del., drawn by a locomotive from Philadelphia, over rails from Pittsburg, fastened with New York spikes to Oregon ties.

But, alas! the worst of our morals seem to be following these wonderful physical inventions. England long ago cursed China with the opium trade. Now our own people are carrying to the Orient our whisky and other intoxicants, and are presenting the most demoralizing of our entertainments.

May God help the good men and women who are struggling to neutralize and beat back these vicious forces, by introducing the pure and undefiled religion of the Master.

This great gathering of young and enthusiastic Christians augurs well for the winning of the world. They predict that in two centuries the work will be done. God grant it! But it will require a long pull and a strong pull and a pull all together.

One of the most touching among all the pathetic missionary tales is that of the consecrated worker among the Eskimos, the Rev. E. J. Peck. His field is on the lonely shores of Cumberland Sound, opposite Greenland, probably the most remote and inaccessible mission station on earth.

With only small snow huts, and no timber there, how was he to get a church?

He begged a contribution of one sealskin from each of his parishioners. Then he organized a sewing-bee among the women. They stitched through the long arctic night until they had made these skins into a great blanket, which, stretched over a rough framework, made a church.

It is by labors and ingenuities and sacrifices like these that the world shall be won.

The Awakening of Korea*

TRAVELERS tell us that Korea is a wonderful country, with a salubrious climate, many valuable mines and vast areas of fertile soil.

It lies in the same latitude as our own greatest eastern cities; is about 600 miles long and 135 miles broad, and contains 80,000 square miles—about the size of the State of Kansas. Its hills are many, but low, and it has ten rivers.

The people live chiefly on rice. They have various fruits, most of them of inferior quality, but the persimmons are said to be the finest in the world.

Everybody smokes in Korea—men, women and children; but when they become Christians they usually put away the filthy weed.

Superstition there, as in most other heathen countries, reigns supreme. Thus, when a drought followed the introduction of the first trolley-cars in Seoul, it was naturally attributed to the malign influence of "the devil that runs the thunder and lightning wagon." At last a mob of thousands gathered, rolled several cars over and over, set one on fire, and took possession of the streets, foaming and stamping like wild beasts.

Ague prevails everywhere in Korea. Smallpox was common until universal vaccination was inaugurated. Asiatic cholera, consumption, and occasionally leprosy are found also. The missionary has to understand how to minister to all of these diseases.

The people dress almost entirely in white, and clean white, men and women dressing pretty nearly alike.

Korea is not a religious land. It contains, says James S. Gale, no great temples, priests, incense-sticks or bell-books; and yet the people seem to have an essentially religious nature. They imagine that dragons, devils and goblins are everywhere, occasionally kind and good, but generally malignant and to be propitiated. Ancestor-worship is a passion among the people. Sacrifices are offered often upon the graves of parents, which are watched and tended with elaborate care, for the repose of the dead is all-important. The general faith of the people seems to be akin to Buddhism.

It is a terrible world in which the poor Korean lives. The life and light of the Gospel, after his own melancholy belief, seem to him like heaven itself. One cannot marvel that he has accepted it so hospitably.

Another reason why Korea has been more ready than other nations to receive Christianity has been its intense admiration for all that is intellectual and literary. Our missionaries early commended themselves to the people by their scholarly attainments.

The children are hungry for learning, and schools are vitally needed there. The men are contributing liberally to them. In a short time the whole land will be dotted with them.

Within fifty years after the arrival of the first missionary in Japan there have been gathered in 75,000 adult Protestant communicants. Within twenty-five years after the beginning of the work in Korea there have been registered 115,000 communicants.

Everything looks promising for work in this strange, interesting land; but men and money are sorely needed, and they are needed at once.

An Appropriate Birthday Present

MRS. MARY ANN RIDER, of Warrior's Mark, Pa., celebrated her eighty-eighth birthday recently. The day was spent entertaining some of the members of her family. Her health is unusually good for one of her years, and she remarked during the day that she did not feel any older now than when she was sixty. Her birthday present consisted of a purse containing eighty-eight cents from each child and grandchild, in all amounting to nearly forty dollars. She has always a warm welcome for her friends, among them her regular weekly visitor, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Our Lookout Round the World

—Dr. Beliscario Porras, Panama's special envoy in Washington, has congratulated Secretary Knox and our State Department on the effective use of its good offices as peacemaker in the dispute between Costa Rica and Panama over the boundary question. He writes: "Both countries are happy that this delicate matter has been settled so that the traditional friendship between the two countries can be maintained without the slightest break." An amicable survey will now conclude the quarrel which once seemed likely to lead to a serious rupture.

—A voluntary increase of six per cent. has been made by the Pennsylvania Railroad to all employees who now get less than $300 a month. About 75,000 will get the increase. Three years ago the Pennsylvania made a voluntary increase of ten per cent. It is said that other railroads will follow the example set by this road. Railroad men generally are always glad to get a position with the Pennsylvania; it has less trouble than any other road with its employees, and the men seem impressed with the idea that the management wishes to do the fair thing for good service.

—Following the good example of the Pennsylvania, the Reading Railroad also announced an increase of six per cent., the raise affecting 195,000 men. The United States Steel Company, Pittsburg, has also issued a statement that wages will be raised.

—During a ball in the village of Mekoerite, Hungary, on March 27, a great crowd of dancers were making merry in a coach-house, which had been decorated with dry branches, Chinese lanterns, etc., for the occasion, when fire broke out and almost in a moment the tinder-like structure was in a blaze. There was but one door, and all rushed to it, creating a frightful panic. The women's dresses caught fire, and soon the entire gathering was enveloped in the flames. Many were trampled under foot. The more they struggled the tighter they became wedged together. The fire spread to the roof, which soon fell. Only a few escaped. It is estimated that three hundred perished in this horrible disaster.

—It is a "far cry" from Gondokoro to Oyster Bay, but Mr. Roosevelt is now on the road, facing homeward. His journey, since he emerged from the African jungle, has been a triumphal progress, to the accompaniment of drums, brass bands, and long lines of natives, armed with spears and shields. At Cairo, however, these military accompaniments were discarded and the returning wanderer once more assumed the habiliments and surroundings of civilization. He has a big round of receptions and speeches awaiting him in the various European capitals before he reaches New York in June next, and plunges once again into the maelstrom of American politics, which holds dangers quite as great as those of Africa, though of a different sort. His return will be a midsummer event in the metropolis.

—Jotham P. Allds, State Senator, resigned from the Upper House of the New York Legislature, pending an investigation of bribery charges made against him, and on the day on which a vote was to be taken, March 29. The case had many sensational features. Checks were produced to show that Allds, who was a prominent member of his party and represented the thirty-seventh Senatorial District in his State, had accepted bribes from various sources to influence legislation. By resigning he escaped expulsion, but the verdict declaring his guilt was recorded by the overwhelming vote of 40 to 9. At least one other Senator is involved as a participator in Allds' corruption. The case has excited a tremendous sensation throughout the State, and is one of the worst illustrations of vicious politics and lack of personal principle and public integrity that has come to the surface in many years.

—And now the meat-packers, in their turn, are charging the farmers with the responsibility for the prevailing high prices of beef and pork. J. Ogden Armour, the Chicago packer, who is now in Texas, says: "As a matter of fact the farmers and stock raisers absolutely control the market, and are organized into unions and leagues, and are starving the people. The packers would cut prices in half if the stock raisers and farmers would sell cattle and hogs at reasonable profits. We are paying more for these now than ever in the history of the country, and we are willing to admit that the cost of putting the finished product on the market is no more to the packers than it was a decade ago, when we paid only half the present price for sheep, cattle and hogs.

—President Taft on March 30 signed proclamations granting the minimum rates under the new tariff law to Canada, Australia and several other countries. These proclamations practically complete the extension of minimum rates to all the commercial countries of the globe. About 130 governments are now included in the list of those which share this benefit. It is regarded as peculiarly fortunate that the tariff war between this country and Canada should have been averted by skilful diplomacy. Under the arrangement now concluded both countries secure important advantages. Canada gets the minimum tariff rates from us, and in return gives us important reductions on thirteen tariff schedules, thus effectually disproving the charge of "undue discrimination" against the United States in comparison with the rate allowed to France and other countries by Canada. Forty staple commodities are affected by the change, representing an annual business of five million dollars. There is little doubt that the arrangement will enlarge future trade relations and deepen the feeling of friendship and commercial reciprocation between the two countries. Apropos, it may be stated that the total customs revenues from all sources this year are already $39,000,000 in excess of those for the same period a year ago.

Ex-President Roosevelt

The Quirinal, Where Mr. Roosevelt Was the King's Guest

King Victor Emmanuel

MR. ROOSEVELT AND THE VATICAN

EX-PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S encounter with the Vatican has not yet ceased to be the topic of two continents. Although he has personally deprecated any sensational discussion of the incident, it was clearly beyond his power to limit that discussion or to direct the current of criticism that has followed the event.

Those who understand Italian politics claim that there has been no time in recent years when anything has occurred that has so greatly shaken the faith of the Italian people in the diplomacy of the Vatican as the Roosevelt incident. Even the Papal press has been greatly chagrined. It may be said that the Italian press generally, with the exception of a few clerical organs, supports Mr. Roosevelt's attitude. Some of the more outspoken journals intimate that Cardinal Merry del Val may be made the official scapegoat and may even be dismissed. The Cardinal, it should be explained, is a Spaniard, and it is quite within the range of possibilities that he may have made the communications to Mr. Roosevelt more exacting and the Pope's conditions less agreeable than would have been the case had they come through other hands. The father of Merry del Val was once Spain's ambassador to the Vatican, and cherishes the traditional Spanish dislike of any power that has humbled the flag of Spain by land or sea. Speaking to a friend the day after the incident, the old Spanish diplomat remarked, "It seems providential that my son should be the man to humble a Yankee President!"

Public opinion adverse to the Vatican is by no means confined to Rome. The German press expresses the opinion that the encounter was not only creditable to Roosevelt, but it was distinctly maladroit on the part of Merry del Val, and will not help the position of the Roman Church throughout the world. In Vienna, all the liberal journals deplore the attitude of the Vatican, and some of them openly intimate that it is dominated by the Spanish atmosphere.

Throughout the excitement, Ex-President Roosevelt was probably the only person of prominence in Rome who did not show signs of discomposure. He went on quietly, as though nothing of consequence had happened, making his preparations for the meeting with King Victor Emmanuel which was to take place on Monday, April 4. The King received the visitor at nine o'clock in the forenoon at the Quirinal Palace, and the two were soon on a most friendly footing, talking over various matters. King Victor speaks English well, and, although Mr. Roosevelt was prepared to conduct a conversation with him in French, he was glad to have the freedom afforded by his own Anglo-Saxon. He told the King many interesting details about his African expedition, and particularly he spoke with him of Italian Somaliland, which he had visited, and told how the colonization project was progressing. From this the talk drifted naturally to Italian immigration to the United States, and the probable attitude of our government on certain international questions. The whole talk was in a friendly social spirit, without much formality, and the two seemed to treat each other like old friends. After the interview, the King invited Mr. Roosevelt to take an automobile ride with him the next day. In the evening the Ex-President and his family dined at the Quirinal, all the Embassy staff being present. Mrs. Roosevelt and Mrs. Leishman sat on the King's right, while Mr. Roosevelt and Ambassador Leishman were placed beside Queen Helena.

Among other social functions which had been arranged for the Ex-President were a dinner with the Municipal Council, another at the American Embassy, and an invitation to speak before the Methodists of Rome. The last-mentioned, however, was upset by an incident that was unforeseen. On Tuesday, after he had visited the barracks along with the King in his automobile, had run out to a royal hunting-lodge to see some trophies of the chase, and whirled back to inspect with King Victor the monument of Victor Emmanuel II. in the Piazza Venezia, and to view the great collection of statuary and marbles worth more than twenty million dollars, the Ex-President returned to his hotel. He was visited by the Rev. B. M. Tipple, pastor of the American Methodist Church in Rome, and had a short talk with the latter. After the interview, Mr. Tipple gave a version of it to the public which displeased Mr. Roosevelt, who was resolved to use all the influence at his command to minimize discussion, and especially to avoid any appearance of religious animosity. What Mr. Tipple said is thus reported by the cable dispatches:

"Mr. Roosevelt has struck a blow for twentieth century Christianity. The representatives of two great republics—America and France—have been the ones to put the Vatican where it belongs. The Vatican is incompatible with republican principles. This is a bitter dose for patriotic Catholics in America to swallow. I wonder how many doses of this sort they will take before they revolt. Is Catholicism in America to be American or Romish? If Romish, then every patriotic American should rise to crush it, for it is the uncompromising foe of freedom. The world advances; the Vatican never."

KING DAVID'S PENITENCE

TEXTS—II. Sam. 1: 12; Ps. 51

PSALM 51 is the broken, passionate cry of a true penitent. The pathos is here, but so is the note of truth and reality. No sham, no cant, no hypocrisy, pollute this page. Tempted, in an hour of weakness, David was swept off his feet, and went down. His sin was black and ugly. The poet-king fell as angels fall from heaven. In retrospect, how are the mighty fallen! Yea, now is the fine gold dimmed! David was at once king, popular hero, poet, soldier and friend. As a king he had betrayed the confidence of his own people. As a popular hero, he had met the admiration and confidence of the common people with untruth, dishonor and injustice. As a poet, gifted with genius to create and beautify an empire, he had wasted his talents, and blackened the ermine of the soul. As a soldier, he had been untrue to the chivalry of arms. As a friend, he had betrayed friendship. In his remorse, the guilty king oft called upon the rocks and the mountains to fall upon him and cover him from the terrors of conscience and from the face of God. The ruin of the poet-king was like the ruin of some great mansion and garden. In a careless hour, the keeper of the gate deserts his post, and in the darkness swine come in to lift the tusk on flower and fragrant shrub, to break down all the vines and arbors, while, under cover of night, thieves loot the mansion, strip the walls, empty the store-house. Lo, when day dawns, what had been a goodly house is but a blackened shell; for the fires of passion sweeping through the house of David's soul soon left it only a heap and a ruin!

Remorse and Suffering

Consider the remorse, the suffering and the recovery of the poet-king. No man of David's manifold gifts could lie in the mud, having stumbled and fallen there. We are all in the gutter, but some of us are looking for the eternal stars. And David's rebound from sin was as swift as the rebound of the bent bow that flings the arrow farther for the bending. No sooner had he sinned than the black shadow fell across the threshold of his soul. Scarcely had he lifted the flagon to his lips than it turned to gall and bitterness. The hand of God lay heavy upon him, and the hand was remorse and recollection, though no man knew the secret battle and the hidden anguish. Then God sent Nathan. Oh, these God-sent men! John the Baptist was a God-sent man, when he stood in Herod's palace and descended on the guilty king like a flame of fire. Elijah was a God-sent man, when he met King Ahab face to face. One night the vision came to Nathan the prophet, and when morning dawned the man of God wrapped his robe about him and made his way to the king's presence. Because he came to plead a case of injustice he had the right of entrance. His appeal was to the imagination through the parable.

David was a poet and Nathan knew his man, and the weak joint in his armor. There was a rich man who dwelt in a palace and his portion was abundance and his life ease. There was a poor man also, who dwelt in a cottage, close beside poverty, and his companion was want and necessity. One day a traveler knocked at the rich man's door, and asked shelter and food. Now the custom of that land forbade any man turning the stranger away, or refusing a night's lodging. The rich man's herds and flocks covered all the hills, but he was so selfish that he was not willing to take a single kid or lamb, to prepare a meal for the pilgrim. In that hour, he remembered his workman, who had one pet lamb. So he sent his servants to take the poor man's lamb, and dress it for the stranger's dinner. And now, the chords of memory began to tremble under the skilful stroke of Nathan. The rich blood mantled David's cheek. The king understood. His house was the palace, and dead Uriah lived in a humble home. His palace still stood strong and his soldier's cottage was in ruins. Craft, deceit, selfishness, acquiescence in Joab's plot, amounted to complicity in murder.

It was a ghastly story. A king was he, but position gave no release from responsibility. He knew the will of God, and he did it not. Henceforth he must be beaten with many stripes. All the storms, chastisements and judgments of God must be gathered up and focalized upon the single life. Henceforth the morning sun will rise, but for David its light will not be pleasant for the eyes. Each to-morrow will open a path, but the way will be full of thorns. Upon his head a flood of sorrows will be poured and his name must be a target for scoffs and obloquy and shame. All incredible it seems that there is any divine alchemy that can extract from this black slough those lilies of penitence and prayer that are the whitest flowers in the garden of the soul.

False Penitence

In the rebound from his sin, David sorrowed, but at first his penitence was false penitence. Somewhere in his Marble Faun Hawthorne says that Donatello wept, but that "his tears had no religious value." Not otherwise was it with King David, in the first stage of his repentance. He sorrowed, but the nerve that ached was the nerve of wounded self-love. All his tears were for himself, and not for his son. His low spirits were incident to his personal vexation and annoyance with himself. He had fallen below his own ideals, and so was deeply chagrined. Before, he had been a Pharisee, who was able to say, "God, I thank thee that I am not like other men." Now, boasting and conceit were impossible when he stood up to pray. He had not kept faith with himself, and his pride was hurt. His sin had wounded his self-respect, just as salt brine makes the wounded hand to smart. How long he had toiled on the structure of his character! And now he had made a black mark on the statue. But his sorrow was the sorrow of an artist, who has fallen below his ideal. It is the chagrin of an architect whose foundation has settled, and who sorrows over a crack in the wall.

There is an age-old witticism about the self-made man being deeply religious, in that he worships his maker; and David had reverenced himself. But all this external and selfish sorrow has nothing to do with true penitence for sin. This resentment is the resentment of pride and of the mind. It is not the resentment of the heart and the abhorrence of the conscience, with the passionate outgoing for righteousness and for God. In Lord Rosebery's history of Napoleon at St. Helena, he gives an account of the reflections of the great soldier. And what do you find Napoleon saying during the long winter evenings of talk with his officers? Napoleon regrets Waterloo, because he had overlooked one plan making ready for the battle. He regrets Warsaw, and the defeat in Russia, because he forgot to reckon with the possible snowstorm, and the rigors of a northern climate for French soldiers. He sorrows because these mistakes made it possible for Wellington's name to eclipse his own. Here also the nerve that aches is the nerve of self-love. Does Napoleon sorrow because he used his genius for oppression and tyranny? Does he sorrow because he filled the world with widows and orphans? Does he sorrow because he spoiled France of her noblest sons? Are his nights wakeful and his pillow wet with tears because 1,000,000 black-robed women and little children, hungry and orphaned, forget to pray and remember only to curse Napoleon before their God? No! No! Napoleon's sorrow is only skin deep. It is mere anguish of wounded self-love.

The Rebound Toward Truth

When a youth loses his position in the firm, the announcement of the dismissal of one who spends nights in drinking and gambling stirs sorrow; but what if the boy is sorrowful because he has no money to pay his board bill? What if he is sorrowful because dissipation has hurt his health? What if he regrets the event because the other clerks will taunt him? This sorrow simply publishes his own pride. Does not true penitence go deeper than that? Are there no considerations of honor for his betrayal of his father's and mother's good name, no considerations of duty and justice and truth toward his employers, no obligations toward God and his laws in society? Always the good is the enemy of the best. Away with this false and superficial penitence! Sorrow for self is a lying sorrow. When I am hungry, give me bread, feed me not with cloud-banks. When I thirst, I ask no mirage, but a bubbling spring. When I am cold, I ask raiment, and not the wrappings of the night wind. There is a sorrow that needs to be repented of, because it is a lie, a sham, the raiment of hypocrisy; its voice the voice of deceit and cant. It is a demon, trai formed into an angel of light, for purposes of l trayal.

Then came the rebound toward truth when Ki David strikes the note of reality. "Against th thee only, have I sinned, and done this evil in t sight." Incidentally his sin was a blunder, th aimed at pleasure and struck pain. Essentially, sin was a rebellion. It was treason of the sold toward his general, the disciple's betrayal of Divine Master, the son's perfidy toward his no father, the friend who unsheaths a naked swo and turns it toward the bosom of his friend—t sinner who betrays his Saviour, God's earthly s who wilfully and deliberately rebels against laws of his Heavenly Father. For David's sorr now goes down to the root of things. In buildi his new life, he digs away the rubbish of dec self-love, and sorrow for the loss of reputat and friends; he builds henceforth on the rock absolute truth, and begins with God. It is a m incident that he has sinned against himself. M important was it that he has wronged his fello but the genius of his sin is, that he has rebel against his God. Not that he publishes his remo He does not climb his pillar, like Simeon Stylites, the presence of the people. But let no man thi that David does not climb his pillar in solitude a secret anguish. His penitence is silent, but it is deep as the silent river that in the darkness g hurrying toward the infinite sea. Outwardly he calm, but inwardly God heaves his soul as the t heaves the ocean. Restitution he makes, to be su He humiliates himself before those whom he l wronged—certainly! He recovers the confide of the people, who say that religion means sor thing when a man makes restitution, and does w this king does. But when the people say that his is ended, David knows that his repentance has o begun. Never again did the poet king stumble! more falling into the bog and slough! Hencefo the angel dwells afar from the fires that threa the plumage of the wings. It is for others to d the precipice, but not for this king. The ye come and the years go, but all life is a restituti a sacrifice, a penitential prayer, a psalm of se ice and tears, a trust in God's mercy. Hencefo David is the Old Testament publican, smiting u his breast, with downcast eyes, while in silence whispers, "God be merciful to me a sinner."

The Soul's Sanctuary

History holds the names of four great men w have bared the secrets of the soul to the gaze millions—David, Augustine, Rousseau and Tolst Augustine opened all the gates into the soul's sa tuary, and let the multitude look in upon the inn most secrets, for reasons of self-humiliation. Ro seau wrote his confessions because he was ess tially a bad man who loved publicity and could live unless he stood in the limelight. Tolstoy aside reticence, silence and the dignity of reserve the hope that the story of his excesses might sh the Russian aristocrats into a recognition of abyss in which they were all floundering, and T stoy's thought was that he might yet save Rus David wrote for God's eye and for his alone. Bu His providence the poet's psalm of penitence w preserved, bound into litanies, and given a place the Hebrew hymn-book. The confessions of other men have done more harm than good.

When Spurgeon came to the end of his life he s that his long experience had convinced him t confessions should be general, but never perso and that no soul had any right to injure another confessing sins that belonged to God and to C alone. The history of the press in our coun speaks eloquently on this point. What unique fe of suicide published in the paper but within a fe night brings a score of imitators in like self-murd The police understand that any new form of m der will, as soon as the newspapers have spr the story, reproduce itself in a dozen other attem at assassination. Crime is a stone thrown in a ri that sends out innumerable circling waves. T harm wrought on society by the confessions Goethe and even John Bunyan's Grace Aboundi and books like Tolstoy's and Rousseau's, is immeasurable harm. But of David's psalm

KEEP OFF THIS SEAT

By Rev. J. M. FARRAR, D.D.*

DO you know the first word of the first Psalm? To say the word you must bring your lips together and then open your mouth to let it out. The word is blessed. You close your lips, and begin to say it as though you wanted to keep it. Then you open your mouth and send it out round and full. This is the first fact to remember about the word blessed. It is half for you and half for others. You always keep a blessing by giving a blessing. In the Hebrew it is a plural noun, "ashrey," and is difficult to say in English. It is blessednesses. God just packed the Hebrew word full of blessednesses. Do I hear you ask what blessed means? It means happy. It is happy packed full of happiness. This is your first lesson in Hebrew.

IN this Psalm God is telling you how to get true happiness. If you want to be happy God tells you three things you must do. Not something very hard to do, but just three things you are not to do. You must not walk in the company of ungodly people. You must not stand with sinners. You must not sit in the seat of the scornful. Walking, standing, sitting. If you take a walk with a bad companion, you will soon be standing on the street corner with him, and with other bad companions. Then it will not be long until you will be sitting together as great friends. The seat will be the scorner's chair. Keep off this seat! The scorner's seat is the unhappy chair. Look at the other three words: ungodly, sinners, scornful. An ungodly person is one who has no reverence for God. Those who have no reverence for God soon become sinners. Then when they become sinners they become scornful. If you want to be happy, you must keep off the scorner's seat. You do not know what "scorner" means? It is that mean something that gets into your thoughts and turns up your nose. It is showing contempt for those you think are not as good as you are. Those you think do not know as much as you know. They are persons whom God may know are better than the one who scorns them. A story will explain the word scornful.

ONE day a beautiful young girl rustled into one of New York's old-fashioned horsecars, and Satan gave her the seat of the scornful. Her dress, of pure white serge, was fresh from the dressmaker's and looked beautiful and dainty. Her little gloved hand held a parasol, tied with a knot of yellow ribbon. It made you think of a great white lily with a golden centre. The car was crowded and among the passengers were some of those Italian laborers that are now doing the rough work of our great cities.

"I think it is dreadful," she scornfully whispered to her companion. "Why don't the company refuse to let such creatures on the cars? or, if they must ride, I should think they could stand on the platform. He will ruin my dress if I touch him. Just see how he stares at me."

AND so he did, his great eyes glistening and softening as they fell on the girl's fair beauty; and then he arose, and, leaning forward to catch the strap, fairly bent over her. The girl grew restive. She was very, very scornful, and turned up her nose as he arose.

"I am sure he is very impertinent," she said, with added scorn, and when the conductor came she motioned him. "Won't you make this man move?" she said.

"Move up!" ordered the conductor. The words were said in a quick, sharp, scornful tone. "Yes," the Italian answered; "but see ze oil! Ze bootiful lady, see!"

The lady looked up, and there saw the oil lamp had sprung a leak, and would have dripped all over her had not this man seen it, and, stretching out his arms above her, formed an umbrella, which had perfectly protected her beautiful dress and bonnet.

A guilty blush came into her face as she bowed her thanks to him, and murmured to her friend, "It makes me ashamed to think while I was scorning him, and he knew it, he should have taken such pains for me. It's a lesson I will not soon forget, that this poor laborer has a better soul than I have. I'll never again be scornful to any one." She will never again sit in the seat of the scornful.

SHE had walked with proud people, then she stood and talked with them, and now she was sitting with them in the scorner's seat. When she found how unhappy she was in the scorner's seat she said, "I will never again sit in it." The dictionary will tell you that the "scorner" is one who holds religion and religious things in contempt. People who laugh at you for being Christian boys and girls. Your father and mother call them bad companions. I read of a little girl who made the seat of a scorner very uncomfortable. She was reading her Bible when a scorner said, "Beatrice, you can't understand that book, and it is not true." Looking at her she said, "There is one thing in the Bible that you make me think is true." "Well, what can that be?" Looking not only at her, but clear through her, she answered, "The Bible says, 'In the last days shall come scoffers,' and you talk like one of them."

Memorize these words: "Blessed is the man [or the boy or girl] that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful." Keep off the seat of the scornful!

* Pastor First Reformed Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. TEXT: "Nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful." Ps. 1:1.

the right and you fall into an abyss of fiery flame, a boiling caldron of liquid red, that spurts and hisses. But at Mont Pelée the approach to the volcano was gradual. For a mile the descent was easy, like a sloping hillside, and the way was gay with scarlet flowers. And yet, when the hour struck, Pelée's crater was just as perilous as that of Vesuvius. Perchance one black sin and awful plunge by King David is no more destructive than many small sins and the gradual descent to evil. The wild beast out of the jungle can smite the man with a single stroke and leave him dead.

But a million enemies in those lesser organisms named the yellow fever can slay just as ruthlessly. For you, too, have sinned and have fallen into the slough. Have there been no rich men whose gifts are the poor man's wage? Have no messengers come with warning? Have not sorrow or joy, public events, the approach of illness or of death been God-sent Nathans for you? Open the book of your heart to the gaze of God's all-seeing eye. Wouldst thou know succor and salvation? Thou canst not sin under God's scrutiny. Even that burglar in the house, ransacking the room, could not go on with his task when he saw the face of the Christ, until he turned the picture toward the wall. Just as the draper in Brighton said that he could not do a mean thing when he looked up and saw Robertson's face looking down at him. Some of you are young, some of you are old; but all are prodigal sons and publicans. Mercy is for God and with him are pity and pardon also. But as for us, ours the cry, "Against thee, thee only, have I sinned." Unable to lift up so much as our eyes toward heaven, let us cry, "God be merciful to me, a sinner."

The Guest

Revelations 3: 20

BEHOLD, I stand before thy door;
I would come in and bless thy store;
I trusted thou wouldst know My voice
And knock, and would indeed rejoice
To have Me for thy Guest to-night!

These noxious weeds about thy gate,
With thorns and briars, make desolate
Thy house; these tangling cobwebs, too,
And leaves and dust. Oh, dimly through
Can shine the Everlasting Light!

I fear these webs. Dank leaves and dust
Endanger thee with biting rust.
Oh that thou wouldst unbar thy door!
I'd sup with thee, and bless thy store,
Could I but be thy Guest to-night!

IN A PARADISE OF THE TROPICS

Mrs. Burkhead and Mrs. Wise in Tehuana Dress

The City of Tehuantepec

The Picturesque Native Headdress

By ANNIE HINDE BURKHEAD

TRAVEL from St. Louis, Mo., two nights and a day and you reach the Mexican border; two more days and a night, and you reach Mexico City; two more nights and a day and you reach San Geronimo, on the Isthmus of Tehuantepec; then two more days on the Pan-American Railroad, and you reach Tapachula, way down below the Isthmus, the last town of importance in the Mexican republic going south. That is the trip we are taking, and we find it one of the most interesting it has been our good fortune to make.

Mr. O'Neil, the famous walker, passed us one day, finishing up his six years' walk around the globe, nearing his goal at Panama. We consider ourselves more fortunate, as we are traveling in comfortable cars, with through passes in our pockets, for all these countries.

Our host and hostess are Mr. and Mrs E. M. Wise. Mr. Wise is vice-president and general manager of the Pan-American Railroad. Their home is in San Geronimo, in the State of Oaxaca. This has been our headquarters, and from there we have made trips to all parts of the Isthmus. We have passed through acres and orchards of oranges, bananas, pineapples and cocoanuts; through immense plantations of sugar, coffee and rubber, and boundless forests of palms, Spanish cedar, walnut and mahogany. Looking across the border we see the volcano Santa Maria, which, three or four years ago, destroyed many little villages and covered all this country with ashes and lava. Even this city, Tapachula, sixty miles away, had over a foot of ashes, and for forty-eight hours the inhabitants were compelled to keep candles and lamps burning continually. The deer and other wild animals from the forests rushed into the town and into the houses for shelter; all the foliage and thousands of the birds of the forest were destroyed.

The Tehuantepec National Railroad runs from Coatzacoalcos, on the Atlantic coast, in a southwest direction, to Salina Cruz, on the Pacific coast. The completion of this road a few years ago shortened the route between New York and San Francisco 1,200 miles; the shipments now being made across this isthmus instead of that at Panama.

The headquarters of this road is at Rincon Antonio, where there are a number of English homes and American flats. Tehuantepec is the capital, and the most important city. The name in Aztec signifies "the mountain of the man-eater."

The Tehuana tribe is perhaps the most sturdy and strong of all the Mexican Indians. Some of the men are really handsome. The Tehuana squaws have a dress peculiar to themselves. It consists of two garments—the "huipel" and the "falda." The huipel is a straight piece of bright calico (generally red, with large white polka-dots) sewed together at the ends, leaving armholes, with a small opening cut for the head. Its chief charm is its rows of stitching around the bottom and the neck, this usually of bright yellow thread. We counted 108 rows of stitching on one we borrowed to have a picture taken. These rows are so close together that, at a short distance, they appear to form strips of braid. The falda is a calico skirt, generally black, falling very full to the knee. On this is sewed an exceedingly full ruffle of white material, which finishes the skirt down to the ever-bare feet. This ruffle is their pride. It is kept as stiff and stark as it can possibly be made, and when it becomes soiled it is taken off, laundered, and basted on again without disturbing the black part of the skirt. The throat is covered with beads, and often with American gold. They save up for years to purchase the American coins.

In the city of Tehuantepec is one of the oldest prisons in the republic, and its history is shrouded in mystery. It was first a convent, then a barracks, and then a prison. For some reason the government had this old structure sealed up. Four hundred years of soil has collected in the crevices and corners, until now great bushes and small trees are growing right out of the walls of the building. At Salina Cruz we dipped into the waters of the Pacific Ocean, and stepped on the slimy jellyfish. Then we watched the unloading of one of the largest freight vessels in the world. With the immense electric cranes they can get out thousands of cans of salmon. These steamers sail for California, Hawaii, South America and China.

The Primitive Coach of the Isthmus of Tehuantepec

This is a beautiful little seaport, surrounded on three sides by mountains. It was washed away once by a tidal wave, but is now protected by two immense breakwater walls. Two monster cannons, pointing out into the ocean, remind us that we are on the extreme western border of the North American continent.

The Pan-American Railroad starts from Gamboa, in the State of Oaxaca, and runs southeast through the large State of Chiapas, a two days' trip. Tonala is about the centre of the road, and separates two very different sections of the country. North of Tonala has been cleared and drained, showing beautiful rolling farm lands.

Below Tonala are the immense forest jungles of the tropics, and the scenes are almost those of our old geographies entitled "Along the Amazon." Many species of song birds are found; monkeys and alligators are numerous a short distance back from the road. Near the town of Pijijiapam, we saw from the train many parrots, wild duck and wild turkeys; and, a little further on, the pink flamingo and the white heron, from which the aigrette is taken. The alligator often grows to immense size, and the exportation of the skin is one of the industries.

The Pan-American Railroad has on its north and east the Sierra Madre Mountains and their beautiful valleys, and on the south and west the hills sloping to the Pacific Ocean; hence almost every variety of altitude and climate can be found. The products are almost innumerable. Sleek, fat cattle dot the valleys all along the line. Thousands of pounds of coffee are shipped every year to England and Germany. The sugar-cane yields from eight to ten years without replanting. The banana plant matures in fifteen months, and yields an average of 400 bunches per acre per year. There are fifteen large henequen, or hemp, plantations, that of Monte Sen having a capacity of half a million leaves per day. In many parts of this district three crops of corn are raised in one year on the same soil. The arms of the Pacific branch in from the west, leaving lagoons, which are dried and evaporated, making salt an important export. Sawmills are found all through the grand forests, preparing the Spanish cedar, resin pine, walnut, ebony, mahogany, rosewood and other fine hardwood for shipping.

Many carloads of "homeseekers" and tourists from the "States" are now coming down, and "land sharks" and land buyers are plentiful. Perhaps the most interesting trip was to the largest rubber plantation in the world, La Zacualpa. We were the guests of the administrator, Mr. Fisher. The administration building is a magnificent structure, with its finishings of the native mahogany. Part of the furniture was shipped by steamer from San Francisco to Benito, then carried on the backs of burros to Tapachula and on to La Zacualpa, a distance of nearly one hundred miles. The piano was brought in this way. The cook and house servants are all Chinese.

The first day we spent with the fruits and flowers of these gardens, the second day we devoted to rubber. We drove for many miles through the rubber forests. The plantation consists of 30,000 acres, and contains within the neighborhood of 6,000,000 trees. Mr. Fisher kindly explained to us the whole process: the tapping of the trees, the collection of the "milk" in the cups, the washing, draining, pressing and drying of the rubber. It is all very simple and inexpensive. They ship out 2,500 pounds of rubber per week, and get $2 (Mexican money) per pound. In less than three years they expect to ship out 1,000,000 pounds a year.

ORE and more the globe-trotting American is realizing that there is something worth seeing in the Philippines, and that there is large part of the archipelago in which he can tour ith safety, and that if he saw no more than quaint alled Manila itself, it would be worth the trip over om Hong Kong. Recently a few have tried motor- g on the islands, but the trips were not very suc- ssful. Great improvements, however, are being ade in the roads. Few, until they have steamed the great bay on which Manila lies, and have ent several days within the city and witnessed e jumble of human types upon the streets, realize at the islands are the abode of so many races and many creeds—a shifting panorama of East and est. Even the centuries seem sadly jumbled, for e grim walls and moat are of the sixteenth century, hile the hustle and bustle in the business parts of e city are most decidedly American. American dustry and capital are slowly but surely putting e material prosperity of the islands on a perma- nt basis, while the schools scattered here and there om Manila to some of the distant provinces, taught as they are by American teachers, are giving the rising generation a wider and more hopeful outlook on life, of which their parents never even dreamed. The many types of religion are of interest, and even at this distance from Mecca are found fanatical Mohammedans, who have their mosques for daily prayer. Catholicism, of course, is strong, but the Protestants are increasing in numbers.

The American finds much to interest him in the Filipino industries, and one of the great sources of wealth in the archipelago is the growing of hemp, or abaca, as it is called by the Filipino. The leading hemp-growing district is Albay, in Luzon, where it has been grown for eighty years. Most of it in recent years has been shipped to the United States, the rest going to England and Australia. If rightly conducted, it is a most lucrative investment, sometimes paying as high as thirty per cent. net profit on the invested capital. Albay has been feeling the same spirit of progress which has become widespread since Dewey's guns thundered over the waters of Manila Bay, and the inflow of American capital has brought results. It takes considerable capital, however, to start in hemp raising, as the first three years there is no profit but much expense.

Education is more regarded than formerly. There is a fine high school building at Albay, a structure which would do credit to many a town "back in the States."

A large part of the population is connected with hemp raising. On many of the estates the work is carried on co-operatively, the laborers receiving one-half the fibre they clean. Various machines have been tried, but hand work is still the main reliance of the planter.

The value of the fibre depends on its strength and whiteness. It is used for many purposes beside cordage. From it are made sail-cloth, mats, brown wrapping paper, hammocks, and, in France, tapestry, carpets, and summer hats. Fewer Panama hats are made here than in Cuba and Central America. These hats are not made in factories, but in the home, yet it is a leading industry. The hats are made from straw and from fine rattan by the young women of the household, who work with remarkable deftness among a puzzling number of strands. Machinery sooner or later will doubtless supersede hand work as it has everywhere.

Roosevelt and the Vatican

When the news of this statement of Mr. Tipple ached Mr. Roosevelt's ears, he very frankly ex- essed his disapproval of it and he decided to cancel e reception which had been planned for the follow- g day at the American Embassy, and, of course, e proposed address before the Methodists of Rome d also to be abandoned. Mr. Roosevelt himself plained his attitude in these words:

"I am speaking specially for the benefit of the ethodist colony, when I say that I have made no rangements to speak at any church or before any rical organization in Rome. I have received a mber of gentlemen of various religious beliefs o have called at the Embassy, but nothing further an this. In view of the circumstances I have quested the American Ambassador not to hold the ception planned for to-morrow. As regards the ort, by whomsoever made, to bring about and lame religious animosities because of what has curred between the Vatican and myself, I can do more than refer to the emphatic statement contained in my open letter to The Outlook already published."

The open letter to which he refers was published in full in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last week. In a later conversation he is reported as having said: "If the German Emperor should place as a condition to an audience that I should not visit the Polish Separatists after seeing his Majesty, I should say: 'With such conditions imposed I shall be compelled to forego the pleasure of an audience.'"

The last word from Rome on the controversy was a communication from Cardinal Merry del Val giving the Vatican version of the incident. It said in substance that the whole matter was "a question of common courtesy." The Vatican had not imposed upon Mr. Roosevelt the condition of not approaching Methodists or other non-Catholic religious bodies in Rome. He complained, however, that the Methodist centre in Via XX Settembre joined hands with the worst anti-papal elements in the city in "an aggravating and insulting manner." The Vatican had reason to fear Mr. Roosevelt might be led, innocently enough, into showing sympathy for this hostile centre, and it was this fear that prompted the wish that was expressed in the letter to Mr. Roosevelt, who "refused all conditions or arguments, and thus allowed the possibility of accomplishing what would be offensive" to the Pope.

Two Successful Evangelists

AMONG the many successful evangelists are two Ohio ladies, Misses Anna L. Cartwright and C. Blanche Gould, who have held many meetings in that State. They hold union revival meetings, and will not visit any city unless the ministers of the city are unanimous in inviting them to come. Their meetings are attended by immense crowds and many are led to Christ.

For fifteen years Miss Cartwright has been engaged in evangelistic work, and for several years she has been superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal Mission Society in Cincinnati. During the winter months she conducts revival services in leading cities throughout the State.

Last summer Misses Cartwright and Gould conducted an automobile campaign, visiting and holding indoor and outdoor meetings in sixteen leading cities of Ohio, especially in the southern part of the State. They spent a week in each city, speaking from the rear of their Gospel automobile to thousands of people. Over 450 persons professed conversion as a result of this campaign. Everywhere they were granted the freedom of the central public squares. Crowds of fifteen hundred to two thousand persons would gather around the automobile to listen to Miss Cartwright preaching and Miss Gould singing the message of salvation.

They also visit the shops and factories and hold meetings at the noon hour. Their open-air services are usually followed by indoor meetings in the churches, or in some central hall or tabernacle.

The Gospel auto used was donated by T. A. Snider, of Cincinnati, who also gave a Gospel wagon to the M. E. City Missionary Society. Mr. Snider bore the entire expenses of the automobile campaign last summer, and no collections were taken nor were donations accepted. The auto carries the workers and their baggage from city to city. The number of regular workers traveling in the auto varied from eight to fourteen.

Mr. Roosevelt and the Vatican

MR. ROOSEVELT did well when he deprecated acrimonious discussion of the circumstances connected with the abandonment of his visit to the Vatican. Viewed in the light of fuller information, the significance of the affair dwindles, and in no sense is it now to be regarded as affording any justification for a religious controversy with the Roman Church, or indeed for ill temper of any kind. In more tactful hands, the communications from the Papal secretary to the Ex-President might easily have assumed a more agreeable form. Mr. Roosevelt's course throughout the whole episode has been marked by dignity and a strict conformity to correct principles. By declining afterward to speak before a Methodist audience, he removed even the suspicion of a desire to make capital out of the incident.

Still, it cannot be regarded in the exclusively personal aspect, as Mr. Roosevelt has suggested. Right or wrong, many have received the impression that the incident possesses a deeper significance, demonstrating that the Vatican has changed but little from its ancient attitude; that it is not in touch with the spirit of the age, and that if it still had the power, it would enforce its policies as inexorably as of old. We do not see that these suggestions are justified by the circumstances of the present case. The Pope and his ministers are keenly, perhaps unduly, sensitive of criticism, and this was evidenced by their sharp characterization of the work of the Methodists in Rome immediately after the Fairbanks incident. We have never regarded that characterization as justified; for while a few individuals have possibly been indiscreet, there is no good reason for the charge that the Methodists in Rome have exceeded their rights or made an improper use of their privileges. For the Papal Secretary, as representing the Pontiff, to imply this, and to practically demand a pledge from Mr. Roosevelt that the "much regretted incident which made Mr. Fairbanks' presentation impossible" should not be repeated, was to set up an effectual barrier. There was not the slightest need of such a pledge. Never in his writings nor in his public utterances had Mr. Roosevelt given occasion for apprehension that he would be the means of stirring up religious strife. Courageous and outspoken as he is on all public questions, yet he is not a man of that stamp. The message was a sharp challenge to his self-respect. It was unsound judgment to use the invitation to Mr. Roosevelt as a whip to lash the Methodists. He is the sort of man to resent such a proceeding. He followed the only course to be adopted under the circumstances.

It is of little consequence whether the original offense was the result of a deliberate purpose on the part of Cardinal Merry del Val, as some journals have asserted, or was mere maladroitness. In either case, the result would have been the same. It is somewhat singular, too, that not till four days after the events in question did the Pope's Secretary see fit to deny publicly that any condition was laid down in the correspondence that Mr. Roosevelt should have nothing to do with the Methodists. But the next day the Cardinal, in a conversation with the Sun correspondent, candidly admits that he requested an assurance from Mr. Roosevelt, "as a gentleman," that he would not visit the Methodists. Whichever version is the correct one, it rendered the situation difficult by an attempted restraint of personal liberty. The trouble with the Cardinal's explanations is that they don't explain; they merely confuse.

Mr. Carnegie on Leaders of Industry

MR. ANDREW CARNEGIE spends quite a little of his spare time, between giving away libraries and helping philanthropic enterprises, in traveling around the country and making speeches on various topics which interest him, and he usually says something that is worth while hearing. Recently he stopped off in Chicago on his way from California, and made a short address to the Press Club. He said that he had no respect for the man who made money with the sole purpose of getting a big fortune; that that type of men had never been greatly respected, and never would be. The millionaire who made his fortune serve him in carrying out great ideas was most worthy of respect. He also called attention to those great captains of industry who loved the management of great businesses, and who were not enormously rich in their own right, serving as faithful guardians for others. He showed that they were men worthy of all honor and appreciation. He cited a long list of such men. Mr. Carnegie also made the prophecy that in the future there would be fewer millionaires, as it was harder to get rich than formerly, and that employees would buy stock and become larger factors in the corporations for which they had worked.

Mr. Carnegie's estimate of the purposes of wealth is in accord with the opinions held by a large number of Americans. Only snobbish worshipers of the dollar have seen anything fine and noble in one who was gathering a "pile" just to have one bigger than his neighbor's. The American of the right type should look over the pocketbook, and estimate the man and his motives at their true value. It must be confessed, however, that the yellow press has raised such a hue and cry against all men of wealth that the unthinking have got the idea that they are all unscrupulous and lacking in high purpose. We believe that the number who have made their wealth honestly and are anxious to use it for the benefit of mankind is large. The accounts of their work, however, may appear in obscure parts of the paper, as it is without sensation and the public enjoys being startled. They have shown that they have felt that they were custodians of part of the country's resources and wished to be worthy of the stewardship.

It is to be hoped that Mr. Carnegie's views on the general increase of prosperity and wealth is true, but the general desire of the people in moderate circumstances to pay out as much as they earn will have to undergo a change if we are to see it in the near future. The desire to live beyond one's means seems well nigh universal; extravagance is our national weakness.

"Myths"

PROFESSOR HILPRECHTS' discovery of a tablet containing a version of the Flood narrative, in the ancient mounds of Nippur in Babylonia, has already been subjected to severe criticism from several quarters. One of the keenest of these critics is Professor Barton, who, not having been in Nippur and never having seen the tablet in question, considers himself fully qualified to pronounce judgment upon its genuineness and as to the value of Hilprecht's translations. With rare skill, he proceeds to prove that the tablet has no historical value, if, indeed, there is such a tablet at all. Then he demonstrates, quite to his own satisfaction, Hilprecht's inferior scholarship. He accuses the latter of having filled up the gaps in the fragmentary tablet with imaginative phrases which are not at all justified, but which are simply invented to make a story. His criticism is a fine example of the kind of scholarship some of the higher critics apply to Bible discussions. His attitude in this case recalls the same writer's remarkable elucidation of the Bible story of the sons of Jacob. Professor Wallace pointed out a year ago the beauties of Professor Barton's method in this particular case. "The six sons of Jacob," he wrote, "were said to be the sons of Leah. Leah probably means 'wild cow,' and this apparently means that these tribes were near of kin and possessed, as a common totem, the 'wild cow,' or bovine antelope." In like manner, Rachel means "ewe," which means that the tribes Manasseh, Ephraim, and Benjamin had a different totem. To such lucid statements Professor Wallace added, "Yes, indeed, this is 'probably' 'apparently' what it all 'means'—or something else." Very wonderful fellows, these professors, who know so much more than other people without even the pretense of having made any special study of the subject. By the application of this unique method one can prove anything. Abraham, they tell us, was a "myth," and, if so, his sons, grandsons and great-grandsons must have been "myths" also. Moses was another "myth," and we must naturally infer that all those individual characters with whom he was associated in Bible and Jewish history also "myths." It is a delightfully easy wa settling things, this "myth" principle, and it req no special training, simply imagination, verba genuity and a mighty confidence in the valu one's own ideas.

The Menace of the Saloon

IT has been well said that the saloon has no po It may be added that it has no mercy. W told over and over that it is the "poor man's c "; his only refuge, after a hard day's work, from c ng children and an uncomfortable home, and that i he saloon a man finds the social diversion he r ds. Those who urge this plea overlook the obvious act that the saloon is primarily responsible fo he wretched home and its many discomforts. The or- get the women who dread the return of husb ds brutalized by drink, and the children afraid to eet a father transformed into a maniac. If Willia De Morgan had done nothing in his brilliant seri of novels except throw a searchlight upon the ev of intemperance, he would deserve to be laurel-cro ed. We are so accustomed to see a saloon on almost ery corner, and to pass a tavern on every country ad where it strikes a village, that our sense of re on- sibility is blunted. A correspondent said the er day, in a communication that reached this p er, that a campaign was now on which rivaled i m- portance any of the former issues for which we ve struggled here in America. He was right. he bar-rooms that attract young men, and older es, too; the money that should go for shoes and od, and is dropped into the till of the saloon; the re ng man who goes downward until he is a social der ct, should all incline us to be up and doing, that his evil may be removed. The late proprietor of the HE CHRISTIAN HERALD did splendid work in extend g a helping hand to the fallen, and there are many no, by his aid, shook off their fetters and became ee. Shall we not try, so far as we can, by word and ed, to make difficult the endeavor of those who ke money by the downfall of their fellow-creatures

A Great Opportunity

IT was a rare opportunity to acquire book of great value and lasting interest which we offered at a nominal price in our issu of April 6. They are by the most famous aut rs, and no one who wishes to enrich his mind wit he best thought of the great writers of the past a of the present can afford to be without them. The re going fast, as our readers seem to realize that ch chances for adding to their libraries occur bu el- dom. A Colossal Railway Station

THE Pennsylvania Terminal in New York City just about completed is thought to be the largest and most beautiful railway station in the world. The building covers an area bounded by Seventh and Eighth Avenues and Thirty-first and Forty-third Streets. It is 780 feet long by 430 feet wide, with a maximum height of 153 feet. Five hundred houses were removed to make way for the building. Four hundred and ninety thousand cubic feet of pink granite and twenty-seven thousand tons of steel were employed in the construction of this station, which covers eight acres of ground. It is built after the Roman Doric style of architecture, such as the baths of Caracalla, Titus and Diocletian, and the Basilica of Constantine, which are perhaps the greatest examples in history of extensively roofed-in areas, treated in a monumental manner. The Seventh Avenue façade, where the main entrance is, is arranged by the architect to carry out the idea of a monumental gateway. It is composed of a colonnade which is double at the carriage entrances, at the street ends and at the main front entrance for pedestrians in the centre. The station is in three levels; on the first is the greatest waiting room in the world, flanked by two smaller waiting rooms. Next to the waiting room is a baggage room, covering the same area as the arcade. On the third level is the train platform, thirty-six feet below the level of the street. There are eleven passenger platforms with twenty-one standing tracks, and a trackage of seven miles. It will accommodate daily four hundred of the Pennsylvania trains and six hundred of the Long Island trains, making a total of a thousand each day. Trains from the West and from all parts of Long Island will deliver their passengers without an exchange of cars, or the use of ferries, in the heart of Manhattan, and it is likely that Montauk Point in the near future will be a port for vessels from the whole world, and that passengers from Chicago, St. Louis, Cincinnati, and elsewhere will have the privilege of taking through trains to Montauk Point to vessels to any part of the world. The improvements planned in and around New York connected with this terminal have already cost $159,000,000 and it is likely that $50,000,000 more will be needed to complete the work according to the plan of the late Mr. A. J. Cassatt. The terminal at Long Island City covers a hundred and fifty-three acres of ground and contains seventy-three miles of tracks. Such in architecture is ever expressing the thoughts that fill men's minds and engage the activity of their hands. The great railroad industry in this country, with its hundreds of thousands of miles of track and billions of money, has a fitting expression in this colossal railway station, which rivals in magnificence the greatest structures of the centuries. And yet, great as this building is, it is small when compared with the structure of character which every good person is erecting. The apostle refers to this building of character and the necessity of extreme caution with reference to the foundation and superstructure in the words:

Let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon. (I. Cor. 3:10.)

Descends Into Volcano Crater

Two young women of Hilo, Sandwich Islands, very recently accomplished the very daring feat of descending into the fiery pit of Halemaumou, the active part of the volcano of Kilauea, standing almost upon the very brink of the lake of liquid fire, dipping sticks and coins into the soft lava, and ascending again in safety. The two young women are Miss Margaret Smith and Miss Louise Greenfield.

With a party these two daring young women left the Volcano House, and soon reached the great crater. The girls were not content to stand upon the edge of the vast pit and look down at the boiling fire, as every one else does, but determined to descend to the level of the incandescent lake itself.

There is no trail down into this fearful pit, and but very few indeed have ever had the temerity to attempt the descent. However, the two girls scrambled down the treacherous sides of the pit and finally stood at the very bottom, where the lava was so soft they had to keep moving to prevent their feet from sinking into the mass. Perilous as was the attempt, both girls managed to reach the top again in perfect safety.

It would not do for many young ladies to undertake the feat these two performed. The two were fortunate in making the top of the mountain. There are many young men and women who go down into the craters of temptation and sin who venture too near to danger. Some make their escape to safety, while others fall into the fires and are destroyed. Parents, teachers and Christian workers should guard the young against going too far in the direction of ruin. The Good Book makes mention of a wisdom which has in it the element of caution.

The wise in heart shall be called prudent. (Prov. 16:21.)

Bucket Shops Raided

On April 2, Attorney-General Wickersham instituted a national movement aimed at the destruction of the bucket shop business in this country. It is the first time the Federal Government has instituted such a prosecution. The Attorney-General procured from the Federal Grand Jury three indictments, in which twenty-nine persons were named, several of whom are millionaires. The complaint is a conspiracy to commit an offense against the laws of the United States. Armed with these indictments special agents of the department of justice simultaneously raided brokers' offices in New York, Philadelphia, Jersey City, Baltimore, Cincinnati, and St. Louis. The Attorney-General holds that these are gambling institutions, and he is determined to put an end to them. He expects the cases to be tried before the summer vacation. Each warrant charges the defendant with conspiracy, which is a felony, and was issued under the Conspiracy Act of March 1, 1909. The minimum punishment for a first offense is two years in a federal prison, and it can be imagined what consternation there is in the camp of the bucket shops. The Attorney-General is right in his determination to break up this bucket shop business, which is gambling under the cloak of business and respectability, and, by the way, it is not unlikely that this step of the Federal Government, which has not been taken any too soon, may lead to some State or Federal notice of the gambling which is carried on in many of the stock, produce, and other exchanges in the great cities of the country, whose excrescences and evils have debauched and ruined, in body, mind, and soul, so many men, young and old. Much honorable business is carried on in these exchanges, but the manifestly gambling features of them ought to be abolished. There can be no such thing as happiness or permanent success in human society except upon the basis of value for value; except in obedience to the law of honesty. Paul expresses this injunction in very simple words:

Provide things honest in the sight of all men. (Rom. 12:17.)

Opium Riots in China

China's determination to destroy the opium traffic is resisted by farmers in some of the agricultural districts. An imperial edict forbade the planting of opium, but the farmers in four districts of Shansi province paid no attention to this edict and planted their fields. As soon as the crop appeared above the ground, the magistrates had them uprooted. Riots were the result, in which some sixty were killed. Troops from the provincial capital restored peace, and it is trusted that it will be permanent, and that the government will be successful in its great attempt to kill the opium trade and consumption. Many of the riots of all kinds have been, like these of the opium farmers, caused by touching the pocket-book. There is the record of a terrible mob which Paul started in the city of Ephesus, when he told them that Diana was not divine, and that her metal images were worthless; and the silversmiths, who felt their business would be ruined, stirred up the riot, which came near being the death of the apostle, and which was quelled only by the tact and courage of the town clerk.

And when the town clerk had appeased the people, he said, Ye men of Ephesus, what man is there that knoweth not how that the city of the Ephesians is a worshiper of the great goddess Diana, and of the image which fell down from Jupiter? Seeing then that these things cannot be spoken against, ye ought to be quiet and do nothing rashly. (Acts 19:35, 36.)

Significant Tributes

At a meeting held in the interest of the Y. M. C. A. in Washington recently the President of the United States, the British Ambassador and the Swedish Minister vied with each other in their praises of the world-wide Young Men's Christian Association. President Taft referred to the dedication of the Y. M. C. A. building at Shanghai, China, built and sustained in part by Chinese mandarins, so anxious were they that the young men be protected from the temptations that await them. The President continued: "I have had so much experience with the matter that I would not undertake any great government enterprise without consulting the head of the International Young Men's Christian Association to see what the supply of secretaries is. On the Isthmus, in the Philippines, in the Army and in the Navy—wherever men congregate, where the temptations are so great that unless they are resisted there will be demoralization—there the Young Men's Christian Association finds its opportunity and does its work for the progress of the race."

These tributes have been justly earned by the splendid organization which incarnates the idea of the salvation of young men by young men, and it is the prayer of all Christian people that it may ever be the safeguard, and through grace divine the savior, of multitudes of young men. The consecrated young men who are engaged in the local, national and international Young Men's Christian Association remind us of the description of the young man who was selected to be the ideal king:

A choice young man and a goodly: and there was not among the children of Israel a goodlier person than he. (I. Sam. 9:2.)

Religion in Business

An intelligent and successful business man in New York, a member of a leading church in Brooklyn, called eighty of his workmen together on Good Friday and gave them a nice brotherly talk on Christ and his atonement, and their practical relation to our everyday life. He said: "We remember the birthday of Washington and Lincoln, and we celebrate the tragical event in the life of One infinitely greater than these patriots, and the One who gave them their aim, inspiration and success." He then dismissed them several hours earlier than usual that they might have a partial holiday. Some of his men were Protestants, some Catholics, and some Hebrews; but all listened attentively to his words, and seemed to be impressed with his message and the brotherly spirit with which he spoke. When the business of the world shall be done within sight of the cross it will be much better for both capital and labor. The central thought of the Christian religion and the individual character is the cross of Christ. The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was instituted by the Saviour that this great central thought, which Good Friday emphasizes, might ever be kept in view:

This do in remembrance of me. (Luke 22:19.)

AMERICA THE GREATEST ASSIMILATOR

The Third Article of the Series on "Our Country, Its Laws and Its People"—By E. R. JOHNSTONE

OUR nation most quickly assimilates and improves newcomers, and is most homogeneous as to speech, dress and aspirations.

> We'll mingle our bloods together in the earth,
> From which we had our being and our birth. —Pericles, Prince of Tyre.

The officers of the Second Division, North Atlantic Fleet, Rear-Admiral Charles D. Sigsbee commanding, had been through a hard week at Cairo. Their Imperial Highnesses, the Prince and Princess of Wales, en route from the great Durbar in India, had been lavishly entertained in Egypt's capital, and the American sailors, whose ships were anchored at Alexandria, had furnished their full quota to the entertainments—dinners, receptions, parades, gymkanas, afternoon teas and the like. Full dress, including all the furbelows, had been obligatory, so that when Admiral Sigsbee at last reached the spacious cabin of the U. S. S. Brooklyn, had donned his comfortable service uniform and acquired a dinner of "home cooking," he sighed in full content and grew retrospective.

"Do you know," said he, "that the most persistent and prominent thought in my mind, in all the display and crowds of last week, was one that has forced itself upon me many times in my travels throughout our own land. It is that America is the most homogeneous country in the world; that there alone do the inhabitants most thoroughly and most quickly assimilate; that you can go from one boundary of the United States to the other and find one language in general use, one prevailing method of dress, one common outlook as to the future and its offers of success. There was no mingling in the big crowds we saw in Cairo. Each nationality was distinct, each race recognizable by differences of speech. If one could have understood the polyglot babble, he would have found each distinctive people with a different viewpoint, not only as to this celebration, but as to life in general. You cannot note these separate and isolated humanities in America, no matter how many immigrants mix with the crowd. With us they melt into a mass—citizens and aliens fuse, as it were—and it is one of the most wonderful things in the world."

Immigration Buildings, Ellis Island. First Landing Place of Newly-Arrived Aliens in New York

The Truth a General One

Was what the distinguished sailor said the truth? I thoroughly believe it, and that you will agree to its verity when you come to think it over. Of course, you must not pick out special places or cities in America; must not cite as examples of the whole land the alien quarters in great centres like New York. The evolution of the alien into the citizen from those very congested centres goes to prove the contention, for in no other land does such evolution appear.

What you should remember is the fact referred to by the admiral. You can travel in, around, about every one of our forty-six States and understand the common speech everywhere used. You cannot do that in Great Britain, nor in France, in Germany, Russia, Austria, Hungary, Italy or Scandinavia.

In China there are 168 distinct dialects and two written languages—Mandarin and Nankinese—in vogue throughout a territory no larger than that of the United States. The Parisian finds a provincial French, that is as obscure as Greek to him, within an hour's railway ride of Paris. How many Londoners can make their way through Lancashire or Perthshire, the highlands of Scotland or the mountains of Wales without an interpreter? How many different languages are used in conversation in the Austro-Hungarian Diet? Do you ever hear anything but plain American talk in Congress, State Legislatures or city councils?

The Second-Generation Change

Is it not true that a German, a Frenchman, an Italian going into any foreign land save America retains his language, his customs, his clothes, his habits of thought, and teaches his children along the lines he followed when a youth?

Is it not true that immigrants to America seek to become Americans in the shortest possible time; that they insist that their children go to American schools from the very outset; that while they may, and often do, retain portions of the distinguishing costume of the fatherland, they neither expect nor desire that their children should do so?

Every adult of us can recall resentment shown by immigrants who, though they had been residents here for years, were classed as German-Americans, Swedish-Americans, Italian-Americans, and the like.

We are all descended from immigrants, for that matter, but if you have been in the way of observing descendants of those who came to this country before our Civil War you must have seen how completely Americanized they are. A majority of them will not or cannot speak fluently the language their parents or grandparents spoke. They may have—they should have—affection for and pride in the land that gave their ancestors birth, but their feelings thereto are purely sentimental or emotional. They are as thoroughly national as descendants of the Pilgrim Fathers, the exiled Huguenots, or the expatriated Scots and Irishmen who came here before the great republic was born. Zangwill put it strongly and tersely when he said that America is the melting pot of the nations, where men and women are being fused into a new type of citizenship, from which the world has the right to hope great things.

Vast as has been the emigration to the United States since 1821—the first year in which accurate figures were kept—it has come in waves, not avalanches, and met on these shores conditions of living and thinking which it could not override or permanently alter, even had those aliens wished to make changes. They had no such wish. On the contrary, they came here, as the mass of them did, to better their own conditions by adopting ours. They found at our very threshold what they sought here, what they lacked abroad—opportunity. They were gladdened to learn that not only was there competence to be gained, but welcome with it. They were needed, they were prized. Their capacity for work—skilled or unskilled—was given free scope, and the fruit of their toil was their own, with no tax-gatherer or overlord to make them afraid. That many of them settled in communities is not to be wondered at. They had to learn our language and our ways, and to have their children taught them. The wonder is that in the second or third generation such communities disappear—are melded into the mass we know as American.

A Concrete Example

A close-to-home example of what I mean can be found in the Canadian province of Quebec. Maine is just over the border, and the emigration from the older community to the younger has been great, especially within the last half century. You cannot find in the Pine Tree State, as you can in Quebec, whole districts where the common tongue is French and wherein the people are as plainly differentiated from those Canadians to the manor born as are Poles from Germans, or Finns from Cossacks.

In 1821 the total alien immigration into the United States was only 9,127, and in 1823 it had fallen to 6,354. It did not reach six figures (104,565) until 1842, and in 1861 and 1862 was below 90,000. So you see America had a long time to gather herself; plenty of time to take and make her own customs as well as her own general and special governments. Not only did the immigrants want a change from what they had been used to in the matter of ruling, but they found rock-ribbed foundations for conduct of affairs.

Doubtless the Scotch-Irish, the English and the Dutch did more than any other nations to fix the foundations, start the currents, direct the governing forces that make for our common weal. Doubtless, too, the 26,769,722 aliens who came into this country from 1821 to 1908 (inclusive) have done much to modify our methods. Let us believe they helped to broaden us and, seeing how they yearned for and prized liberty, gave us higher, holier concepts of its meaning and its value.

Common Aspirations

The aspiration of every one, in the last analysis, is toward personal well-being. Each of us, foreign or native born, wants personal prosperity and comfort; wants a chance to rise and to have children that will be better off than we, better educated, of more moment to the community. When the decent emigrant reaches us (and I am not taking the criminal classes into account; they should assimilate with convicts, not with citizens) he found the realization of these personal aspirations possible—possible as nothing he had heretofore encountered had given him faith to hope for. This is one of the main reasons why he assimilated, why he wanted to, and why his children became so rooted to the soil and so proud of our common flag. The alien saw that his possibilities of advancement were due, in large measure, to the freedom of living that engenders self-respect, to the absence of tyranny over person or purse, that smothers endeavor and chokes hope to death. Is it any wonder that, viewing his own changed condition and opportunities, he adopted the varies of the land that made him not only a free and independent, but a hopeful, resident?

Incidents in Point

A few years ago I was the guest of President Pennington, of the Minneapolis, St. Paul and Sault Ste Marie Railway, on an inspection trip which covered the 3,500 miles of the road in North Dakota and Minnesota. Along the Missouri River, opposite the Standing Rock Reservation, were many small settlements and farms, that attracted my attention by reason of the fact that houses and barns were painted a vivid green while in the yards and meadow of each holding were reared huge stacks of manure and grass moulded into a sort of peat, and used as the sole fuel for that somewhat bitter climate.

I asked Mr. Pennington who lived in these houses, and, when he said "Mennonites," confessed surprise. I knew of the sect in a general way, was aware that they had come from Russia, dirty, unkempt, moody, undesirable, and could scarcely credit them with a prosperity to which the homes and fields bore witness.

"Prosperous?" said the president of the road that has done much to make life worth living for immigrants into the Northwest. "I can point out, within a five-mile run, a score of Mennonites who came into this country ten or fifteen years ago with property it would have been a joke to value at more than $100 who are now worth from one to two hundred times that sum. They defied storm and discouragement. They soon reveled in a new liberty of conscience and labor that nothing could daunt them. They fairly worship our flag. The very first thing they did when able to spend any money outside of bare living expenses was to build schoolhouses and hire American teachers. I'll wager they and their offspring know more about the government of the State and nation, more about the duties of citizens to the flag, than do half the native residents of Bismarck or Sioux City. Their love for this country and their determination that their children shall become worthy citizens is absorbing—and a bit revealing to those of us who take our citizenship for granted. I wish we had more Mennonites. We would have that many more good patriots."

A Street of All Nations

"If you want to realize what the apostle meant when he spoke of 'barbarian, Scythian, bond and free' go out Broadway and count the nationalities by reading the signboards," said a Cleveland citizen with whom I was speaking of this very subject of assimilation. So I went. In one block (taking both sides of the street) I found the following nationalities represented by shops (meat, vegetables, groceries, bakeries), stores (dry goods, hardware, electrical supplies, drugs, etc.) and factories: Russian, German, French, Danish, Finnish, Norwegian, Swedish, Turkish, Grecian, Sicilian, Calabrian, Magyar, Austrian, Armenian, Egyptian, Roumanian, Tunisian, Bohemian, Syrian, Hawaiian, Welsh, Bornese, Chinese, Spanish, East Indian, Javanese, Japanese, Korean, Tahitian, Filipino.

Thirty in all, congregated along a frontage of 600 feet. Probably there were other blocks that would have shown a census equally diverse.

I made it my business to go into a score of these places of business. I did not find one in which English was not spoken, nor one in which the costumes worn were different from those we are accustomed to see, save in the laundry of the Chinaman and the fancy goods stores kept by the East Indians.

Aliens Taking Out Naturalization Papers, New York City

Special Urban Populations

There are those who will not agree to the conclusions above set forth. They will contend that the mass of immigrants started Westward with a view to better their physical conditions, and with little care for our institutions. They will point out that in 1900 Minneapolis was the fourth Scandinavian city in the world in point of population, being exceeded by Copenhagen, Stockholm and Christiania only; that New York's population contains more Jews than did Jerusalem at the time of our Lord; more Germans than any cities except Berlin and Hamburg; more Italians than any places save Naples, Genoa and Rome.

Granting these claims, is it not true that Minnesota's Scandinavians are of the "most straitest sect" American? Witness such examples as United States Senator Nelson and the late Governor Johnson. Is it not a matter of general regret that the New York alien inhabitants referred to do not, in greater measure, seek the country and the smaller towns, and for the reason that they would there be absorbed and assimilated more quickly? Take the second and third generation Germans, Italians and Jews of New York, and are they not real Americans in every sense of the word? One of the principal objections to emigration from the so-called yellow race is that its units do not come to stay; cannot assimilate, as intermarriage would be objectionable, and in no sense are fitted to become citizens of the republic. That no one thinks of excluding any other races in the mass goes to show that all others are capable of assimilation and citizenship.

In his Americans in Modern Life Alberto Pecorini, an Italian writer of note, comments on the assimilative quality in American nativehood, and so, too, does Guglielmo Ferrero, the Italian historian and commentator, in his Impressions of America, now appearing in Figaro.

Recently Professor Paul N. Milukoff, historian and leader of the Constitutional party in Russia, advanced his belief that the Russian emigrant to America would gladly return to the land of the Czar if he could go back to a new and free Russia. This contention has been somewhat heatedly denied by prominent Russian emigrants and by editors of leading American papers, but whether true or not, it is aside from the question. When there is a "new and a free Russia" in fact, the truth or falsity of Professor Milukoff's belief will appear.

Statistics as to Nationalities

At the end of the fiscal year 1908 the total immigration, from 1789, was given officially as 27,049,722. The census of 1900 gives the total of foreign-born population as 10,460,085 in a general total (Porto Rico and the Philippines excluded) of 76,303,387. In this total of more than seventy-six millions the census found but 1,217,280 who could not speak English, and immigration tables for the five fiscal years (1896-1900) preceding the census show that the total immigration of foreigners into the United States had amounted to 1,563,685, or 346,405 more than the whole non-English-speaking population.

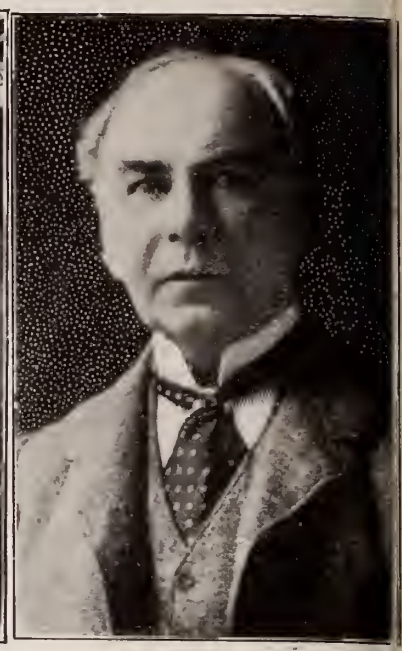
PROMINENT PEOPLE TALKED ABOUT

Lord Kitchener

The German Emperor Taking a Ride on Horseback, Berlin



Sir Robert W. Perks

SIR ROBERT W. PERKS, baronet and member of Parliament, now on a visit to the United States, is the son of a Wesleyan preacher. He lived for a time in Wesley House, having for a bedroom John Wesley's old "Praying-room." He was brought up in an atmosphere of Spartan-like discipline, but was grounded in sound doctrine. He is now known as the foremost Methodist layman in the British Empire, intense in his devotion to his church and in all good works. He was knighted in 1908 by King Edward. He has, in many ways, promoted the welfare of the working-classes, particularly of railwaymen. He has never refused to meet the representatives of the union, and says he has almost always found disputes capable of satisfactory solution. Many reforms to aid the Nonconformists have been brought about by this fearless leader. He has given whole-hearted support to various agencies for the encouragement of temperance, and worked earnestly for Sunday closing of public houses and for general Sunday observance.

Sir Robert's greatest undertaking was the raising of the "Million Guinea Fund," to be divided among various departments of church work and to promote new enterprises, the most conspicuous of which was the erection of a monumental building to serve as connexional headquarters and as a centre of evangelistic and social effort. The building, which is near neighbor to Westminster Abbey, will not be completed before October, 1911.

"My criticism on the Americans would be," he said to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD representative, "that you do not conduct your religious work on a scale corresponding to your business enterprises. You have great cities, great buildings, great fortunes; but you do not seem to carry your church work on so ambitious a plan."

Sir Robert expressed a warm interest in the work of the Bowery Mission and the practical assistance that had been given by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD through its various philanthropies, especially its famine funds.

THE newly arrived American tourist to Berlin will, when taking a stroll along Unter den Linden, suddenly see the people surge to the curb; those in the ever-present uniform will kick their heels together and raise their right hand to their caps. The others will raise their hats and give a hearty cheer as a small cavalcade goes by at a brisk pace, led by the German Emperor on his daily ride. The people may have seen him only the day before, but they cheer just the same, and the traveler is convinced that the Kaiser still holds a firm place in the hearts of his subjects despite the fact that his utterances at times are not as diplomatic as the most conservative might wish. One great source of his popularity is that they feel that his main ambition is to increase the greatness and prosperity of the Fatherland. He is encouraging German trade and commerce. Every one is familiar with the little sign "Made in Germany," which appears on innumerable articles of daily use, and it is seen more frequently every year, and is alarming other manufacturing countries. The people are also with him in the desire to build a larger navy to protect this growing commerce, and his desire to extend German spheres of influence. In other words, he represents the national ideals. The Kaiser's son, Prince Eitel, has just gone to Jerusalem to open the new German Hospice in the Holy City.

AFTER an absence of many years Lord Kitchener of Khartoum, one of the most famous and intrepid of living British generals, is visit this country, having recently lande San Francisco on this way home. has been serving continuously seven years as commander-in-chief the British forces in India, a most d cult and important post on account its long distance from support home. In case war was declared w some European power the forces India would have to fight their c battles and win or lose on their c numbers. Lord Kitchener's servi in Egypt, culminating in the great tory of Omdurman, where the far ical tribesmen of the desert flung th selves in vain upon the serried ra of his well-disciplined troops, known the world over.

Lord Kitchener entered the army an engineer officer at the age twenty-one in 1871. Eleven ye later he was in command of the Eg tian cavalry, and in the Nile exp tion of 1884 received his first meda the Khedive's star and a lieutena colonelcy. His promotion was ra He was made a major-general in 18 and crushed the forces of Mahadi n Khartoum. After the South Afri war he was made a viscount and ceived a grant of $250,000 from Par ment.

THE "BRIDE OF THE SWORD"

MISSIONARY Charles W. Posnett, of Medak, India, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD under date March 7:

"A few months ago, a little native girl was rescued from being married to a 'Sword,' and I believe a letter from one of our medical missionary women regarding her pitiful case will be of interest.

"It was on the 1st of June that little Veeramma was claimed to become the wife of a 'Sword'; but the marriage ceremony was postponed, for an eclipse of the moon was expected on the fifth, and though to be married during this time is a calamity, it is an auspicious time, the natives believe, for mastering incantations and exorcising the evil effects of devils; so little Veeramma was being initiated during these days and taught songs, which she was to sing at the temple when the day of her marriage should take place.

"Married to a 'Sword'! What can it mean? In the Nizam's dominions, any Hindu or Mohammedan man can carry and use a sword free of license, and so little Veeramma was chosen to become 'one' with this instrument—symbolic of her future—free to be trodden under the foot of men. We are not ashamed to say we paid a sum to redeem her from such a fate. Why did her parents permit such a sin? Those parents were poor and degraded, and though there had been given to them two other daughters, they were not deemed fair enough to dedicate to the gods; but when little Veeramma came, with her olive complexion, and dark, liquid eyes, she was counted worthy, for she would earn money and bring plenty into the mud hut which was so poor and so barren. The government, too, would give a yearly grant of land, and they would receive a tithe from the land owners, and during the harvest season each cultivator would lay a bundle of grass or a sheaf of corn at Veeramma's feet.

The "Bride of the Sword"

"How were we able to redeem her? In her village was one of our evangelists who had made friends with her people. Often the little heathen child had slipped into the day-school, where the evangelist's wife taught the village children about Christ. For some time Veeramma was missing from the school, and on inquiry the evangelist found that near the village temple a plot of ground was being prepared for the marriage of a devil priestess to a Sword, and the bride was to be no other than little Veeramma. The evangelist saw the priests and the parents, and pleaded; but it was of no use. T he crossed the river, and came and t the story to Mr. Posnett. The pri and missionary consulted and needed sum was provided to rede the child from a life of sin. The c ditions of the redemption were t she was to be brought into the Me boarding school. Though she had actually been initiated, it was only the eve of that initiation that rescued her.

"The patch of ground chosen for initiation was just ten feet squa and in the centre with five differ colors had been drawn a trian Daily at five o'clock in the even little Veeramma had been escorted this sacred spot, and put to sit wit the triangle. Before her were pla two earthenware pots of native b and spirits. The priest came and m tered incantations over her, and bu incense and other spices. The fut 'bride' was whipped with the twigs the Margosa tree, and then was c sidered fit to be taught to feign 'd possession.'"

Was it not worth while making effort to save this poor child fro fate worse than death and to br her under Christian influences?

THE BUDDING SPRING-TIME

Our Friend the Dog

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

WHAT has become of all the good people who love man's most intimate friend in the animal creation? Has the dog no friends left? It would seem, at least in many suburban communities, as if in their terror of the dread disease hydrophobia people had lost both common sense and humanity. There have always been occasional cases of rabies in dogs, and occasional deaths caused by the bite of a dog suffering with this malady. Probably, however, there have been deaths induced by apprehension and nervous terror which were not due to the poison of a dog's bite. To be bitten by any animal is by no means a pleasant experience, but prompt cauterization, if the animal is healthy, and the Pasteur treatment, if the case is the reverse, may be safely trusted to give immunity from peril. At the present moment hundreds of those who care a great deal for their trusty companions, the dogs who seem almost human, are filled with regret at wholesale edicts for canine extermination. A craze seems to have seized upon boards of councilmen, and the dog-haters outvote the dog-lovers. When a resolution is passed to the effect that every unmuzzled dog in a village or town shall be shot down without mercy and without an opportunity for his owner to claim him, when at the same time a reward is offered for every unmuzzled dog that may be found anywhere on the highway, two evils take place. A base and brutal variety of man and boy is usually willing to hunt for stray dogs in order to gain the fifty cents or the dollar offered as a premium. Sometimes these people are not above removing a muzzle from a dog that has gone beyond his own bailiwick. This may be done easily, as a few dogs enjoy being muzzled and many of them are very trustful and will confidently approach a needling stranger.

In a place within an hour's reach of New York a woman just recovered from an illness went one day to look for a maid. She found the person of whom she was in search living in a very poor neighborhood, where there was a vacant lot and several tumbled-down cabins were scattered about. Her own dog, a beautiful collie, was with her, fortunately on a leash. She was presently startled at the sight of a man very near her, who was pointing a pistol. That it was not precisely in her direction made it safer for her, but it did not save her from a nervous shock when the pistol was fired three times in quick succession; and so, a lover of dogs, was told that three of these poor friends of ours had been killed almost before her eyes. Decency is outraged in a community where such proceedings are possible. Under a régime like this the luckless mongrel, worth nothing in the market, but probably affectionate and faithful, and the prize dog, valued at his weight in gold, share the same fate.

Another evil certain to march in the wake of the popular scare about dogs is the encouragement that will be given to thieves in general and to midnight prowlers in particular. Every one is familiar with the reply made by a convicted thief to the judge who sentenced him—or was it to a cross-examining lawyer?—to the effect that in his long career of depredation what he had most feared were a common bolt and a small dog. Neither in city nor country can the police be omnipresent, and householders are often protected from their foes, the house-breakers by profession, if they are guarded by a vigilant dog. Children who grow up with dogs for pets learn kindness to animals from the time they can toddle about. A boy who has never had a dog of his very own is a boy to be pitied. We might imitate the good example set us by our cousins across the sea, and, as in London, provide here and there drinking troughs on the streets at which thirsty dogs might appease their distress.

An ownerless dog, or a lost dog, is an object of pity. Last summer, in a rural village in the mountains, such a dog was adopted by the entire population and roamed at his will from farm house to farm house, everywhere welcomed, everywhere fed, everywhere hailed by name. He was really the dog of the township, and when a city boarder threw a stone at him the resentment of the people was so freely expressed that the man retired in shame.

People are seldom indifferent in their attitude to this dumb friend. It is "love me, love my dog." A dog inspires liking or aversion according to our temperament and training. It might be well for us to look at the subject from every point of view before encouraging the extermination in our midst of this hitherto trusted comrade and ally.

PLAYMATES

Happy little comrades in the morning glow,
Knowing naught of trouble as the hours go.
Time enough for toiling in the by and by,
Happy little playmates 'neath the sunny sky.

Feminine Fondness for "Things"

UNDER the general name of things the genuine woman arranges mentally belongings of many varieties. Articles of wearing apparel, from hats, wraps and gowns to frills and furbelows, pomps and vanities, gloves and shoes, are denominated "things." They are things to wear, things to have and hold, things that move other women to admiration or envy, things that form a part of the paraphernalia of the passing years. Where is the woman who does not understand what it is to care a great deal about delicate and dainty laces and chiffons? Where is she who has not a regard for pretty articles of ornament, not merely on account of their decorative value, but because they have been endeared by long use and association? Two friends, who had not met for a dozen years, came together one summer day. The first words exchanged after a brief initial greeting were, on the part of the younger to the older: "I see that you still wear your silver comb. I was afraid you had lost it, or had taken up some new fashion. I always think of you as wearing your hair with that particular comb." The reply of the other was: "Well, my dear, I care more for that comb than I would for a tiara. It belongs to my life from girlhood until now."

Two ladies were conversing the other day on this same familiar subject of things, and one declared that her passion was for beautiful household linen. "I have no especial liking for fine dress," she asserted, "but I can never pass a linen counter without wanting to linger over tablecloths and napkins, and I prize my linen closet, with its store of sheets, pillowslips and towels, more than I do any other room in my house." Still another woman, a notable housekeeper, finds herself inclined to loiter among kitchen utensils and novel inventions for cooking and cleaning, when she is on a shopping expedition. Egg beaters, coffee mills and carpet sweepers have a fascination for her. They are the things that look at her from the shelves and the corners with a specially earnest appeal.

It is to be noted that while clothing, furniture, fine china, rugs and curtains may be very properly catalogued in one's mind, and alluded to in one's talk as "things," books, pictures and jewelry are never thus described. Emeralds, rubies and diamonds, pearls and sapphires have so distinct and individual a value that they cannot be heedlessly spoken of as things that in their very nature are transient. We are told that precious stones have not a fluctuating market value, but continue year in and year out to possess a definite worth that makes them a singularly fine investment. Then, too, the finest diamonds and rubies in Europe and America have a history that is known to those who deal in gems, so that they may be traced if they are stolen, and perhaps may be recovered, unless indeed they are mutilated or tossed into the sea. The woman who owns a rope of pearls or a diamond sunburst thinks of her pearls and her diamonds, and does not call them things. Neither are books and pictures, being the direct expression of genius or talent, and in some way the outcome of the human mind, carelessly classed among the things that perish. A book or a picture may as really be an heirloom as the finest jewel in the safe, and it differs from the jewel in having a greater vitality. The love we give our books is more like the love we give our friends than it is akin to the liking we have for our other possessions.

Questions and Answers

In forwarding MSS. to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, enclose stamped envelopes for return, if unavailable.

C. D. K., Hegins, Pa. Could a boy be named Clairmont? Some claim it should be spelled Claremont, as Clairmont is the name for a female. Which is correct?

There is no strict rule for spelling proper names. In this case neither name given has gender in English, and originally, without doubt, it was a French family surname, made up from the French clair, meaning clear, and mont, meaning mountain. Either spelling may be used, whether the person who has the name is a man or a woman. Claire alone would be used perhaps for a girl; in combination with mont it loses any feminine association.

R. S., Tremont, Mich. 1. Tell me of the mother of Florence Crittenton. 2. What was the maiden name of Dolly Madison, and the name of her husband, deceased, before she married Madison? 3. What was the name of Thomas Jefferson's wife at the time she married Jefferson, and what was her family name?

1. Write to the nearest Crittenton Mission for information. 2. Mrs. Madison was Dorothy Payne. After her marriage she was called Dolly P. Madison. She was a Mrs. John Todd when Madison married her. 3. Jefferson married Mrs. Martha Skelton, daughter of John Wayles. She died before Jefferson was inaugurated, and the White House was practically without a hostess.

A. A. T., West Haven, Conn. Where did the translators of the Authorized Version obtain the original of their translation of Rev. 22: 14? It differs from the American Standard Edition, the Douay Version, and the American Bible Union Version, which are practically agreed; also Westcott and Wert's Greek Testament.

The translators who worked on the A. V. had scant material compared with the later revisers. In the last fifty years there has been a great advance in textual criticism and many ancient manuscripts, not accessible to the A. V. translators, were available to the others, including especially the Alexandrian, Vatican and Sinaitic manuscripts. The King James revisers had for comparison the Syriac, Coptic and Cyprian versions; yet the Vulgate gives the reading "(blessed are they that) wash their robes" (i. e., in the blood of the Lamb) (see Rev. 7: 14) which takes away the idea of salvation by works. The words "to come" (to the tree of life) are parenthetical and not in any original, but are held as implied. Prof. Weiss gives as a variant the reading, "that they may have authority over" the tree of life, etc.

O. S., Richmond Hill, N. Y. What is the proper way to pronounce the name of the late Dr. Louis Klopsch?

The name is pronounced as spelled, but with c silent.

J. B. L., Johnstown, Pa. Please give me an argument against a union or confederation of all churches.

We do not know of any against a union for practical humanitarian work. A union which implies the abandonment of old creeds for a new one, which combines the best points of all, is as yet impracticable.

E. E. J., Pensacola, Fla. 1. Has Admiral Peary submitted his observations of his discovery of the North Pole to a scientific body for examination? 2. Who owns the tallest building in New York City? How many feet high is it, how many stories has it, and how deep is the excavation? 3. Has New York taller buildings than any other city? 4. What salary does the Mayor of New York City get? 5. What is the length of the largest steamship? 6. Who supports the Bowery Mission in New York City?

1. Mr. Peary showed his records to a committee of the American Geographical Society, who said they would accept his statement that he had reached the Pole. It is not understood that they studied the books and verified each observation. The explorer has been asked to submit his proofs, by members of Congress and others, but so far this has not been done. It was suggested that the same impartial body which passed on Cook's records should have the opportunity to pass on Peary's, but this, as well as the plan that they be submitted to some American university, has been declined by Peary. At present no one knows what his positive proof is. 2. The Metropolitan Life Insurance Building, in Madison Square, New York, is the highest building in the world. The next is the Singer Building, on lower Broadway. The Metropolitan Life Insurance Building is 700 feet 3 inches high; the turret is higher. On this is a flagpole. It has fifty stories. The Singer Building is 612 feet 1 inch to roof. It has forty-one stories. On this is a turret. The Municipal Building is over 500 feet. There are a large number over 200 feet high. 3. New York has the tallest buildings in the world. 4. The Mayor of Greater New York receives a salary of $15,000 per year. 5. The Mauretania is the longest steamship. She is 790 feet in length. 6. The Bowery Mission is supported by voluntary contributions, sent from all parts of the United States. We know nothing of the book mentioned in your letter.

S. S. M., Kentucky. Kindly give the origin of Santa Claus.

Santa Claus (or Klaus) is a corrupt contraction of St. Nicholas. St. Nicholas was an Archbishop of Myra in Lycia in the fourth century. He is the patron saint of Russia, and many seaport towns and different classes, especially of boys and girls. He died December 6, 342, and that day is celebrated in Greek and Roman Catholic countries. The German diminutive of St. Nicholas is Santa Claus, and in most Protestant countries he is connected with Christmas instead of December 6. He is the Dutch Kriss Kringle.

O. P. M., Salisbury, Vt. Is Ex-Vice-President Fairbanks a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church?

Yes; Mr. Fairbanks is a prominent layman of the Methodist Church.

Rev. John O. Y., Westminster, Maryland. 1. Are there any nations that eat four, five or six regular meals daily? 2. Whence did we derive the custom of eating three regular meals daily? 3. What is Fletcherism and is it the proper way of eating?

1. In many parts of Europe four, five and even six daily meals are eaten. Throughout most of France, a roll and coffee are eaten early in bed; a fuller breakfast follows about eleven; luncheon at two; afternoon tea at five; dinner at eight. In parts of Germany, similar hours are followed. In the Orient, light meals and many of them are considered more healthful than fewer heavy meals. 2. Universal industry has probably caused the general custom of three meals. They divide the day most naturally for laborers. 3. Fletcherism's chief tenet is the fine mastication of food. Dr. Fletcher claims that the longer the food is chewed the more nourishment is derived from it. No more time is needed, because less satisfies the hunger.

Flicker, Grafton, N. Dak. 1. I intend to take a trip abroad next summer, and wish to carry no luggage except a large suitcase. What clothes can I take in order to be properly dressed? 2. How can I study Germany and Switzerland in a systematic way?

1. Try to carry two extra sets of underclothing. You can get washing done overnight, usually, at places where you stop, but the clothes are not quite dry the next morning. If you have a strong, new cloth traveling gown, you can get along with only one firm, thin silk skirt besides, and two or three silk and other waists. A raincoat can be strapped on the outside of the suitcase. Have large pockets made in it. Your outer petticoat may well be made of strong, fine brilliantine. Have one or two strong pockets in it. A folding umbrella can be strapped also on the outside of your suitcase. A sweater can be folded in with your raincoat. Take an extra pair of shoes. A chatelaine bag, for tickets, change, etc., is more convenient than a handbag, though both may be needed. Roll the underclothing tightly. A system of pockets, made of silesia or any strong cotton goods, will be convenient to hold veils, handkerchiefs, ties, pins and other trifles. 2. Buy any good hooks on the countries named, and read them carefully, committing to memory important facts, and reviewing them often.

U. S. Senator Dolliver

UNITED STATES SENATOR JONATHAN PRENTISS DOLLIVER is one of the best known of our public men at the present day. His long and active Congressional career has brought him into personal contact with the great problems of legislation and has afforded him ample opportunities for observation as to the general tendency of the nation in morals and religion. Senator Dolliver is thus well qualified by ability and experience to reply to the question which was put to him as follows:

"Is the spirit of Jesus more dominant in business and public affairs than when you entered active life, and is it an advantage or not for a public man to-day to be known as a professing Christian?"

The Senator's answer shows the continuous moral and religious advancement of the nation, and how the Christian is now universally regarded in public life.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY
UNITED STATES SENATE

My Dear Sir: Washington, D. C., December 15.

I am convinced that there has been a great improvement in the morals of our public men during the last twenty-five years. I have made something of a study of this subject, examining into the habits and customs of the statesmen of the times of Clay and Webster, and of the intervening period, and I know that a great many habits and practices of those days would not be tolerated as honest.

I think it is a decided advantage today to a public man to be known as a professing Christian. It is certainly true that no man who has openly scoffed at religion has ever achieved a prominent place in the leadership of our people.

Very truly yours,

J. P. Dolliver

The Strawberry Handkerchief

A Tale of Colonial Days in Old New York

By AMELIA E. BARR

CHAPTER NINE—Continued

AT the moment when Harry delivered the letter to Virginia, Madame entered with the promised meal, and Virginia answered her unspoken question with an offer of the letter to read.

"No, no, but thou read it aloud," said Madame. "We are all friends here, and I must serve thy father first of all things."

Then Virginia spread out the sheet of thin perfumed paper, with its gilded edges, and tinted coat of arms, and read as follows:

"BEAUTIFUL AND BELOVED VIRGINIA: When you receive this message, I shall be on the sea, and doubtless wishing myself in a better place. For really, the ways of the sea would try the temper of a philosopher ten times my size. However, I have accommodated all my affairs to my utmost satisfaction. I must tell you that your last letter stopped to rest on its way, and I did not receive it until I was just about to sail. In a few days I will answer all its complaints with congratulations. When are you to be married? You must hurry your preparations, if I am to be your maid; for my father wishes to leave New York for London about the eighteenth of this month. I fancy, from late reports, England has caught the fever of revolt from America. Her fidgety ministers and her bad-tempered people are having a dog-and-cat time of it. Indeed, I could laugh at the blunders the English government is making, only that I do not presume to laugh at any thing that England does. Cross out the last sentence—the words were at my finger tips, and so they slipped through my pen. I have not spoken of the weather yet, and what is a letter worth without reference to it? I can at least say that in Boston it has been giving full license to its temper—blowing east, and west, and every other kind of cold and sleet.

"My service to your delightful father and mother, and I beg also that you ask that witty Captain De Vries to remember me. What a clever, original creature he is! In my pen there is just ink enough to write the word Arent, and to assure you of my undying love.

"ROSE HARLEY."

"A pretty letter," said Madame.

"A letter from the beautiful lady's heart," said the Captain.

Harry thought it was a "less amusing scribble than usual," but he added, "The Atlantic Ocean can put the merriest heart in the sulks."

"Sulks!" cried Batavius, rising and walking proudly about the room. "I consider that letter perfection. It is exactly what a real titled lady would write. She forgets no one. It is a great satisfaction to find myself remembered by a lady of the nobility. This is what comes of my politeness, and of my believing everything in the world is good. If I had been one of the discontented, complaining men, Lady Rose Harley would not have asked me to remember her. To speak the truth, I think I deserve it; yes, I think I deserve it."

"Do be quiet, Batavius," said Harry.

"I remember distinctly, that I was fortunate enough to instruct Lady Rose Harley on some points."

"Batavius, what are you peacocking about? Sit down."

"Harry Rutgers, if you were in my place, if you had just received a very flattering and delicate compliment from a beauty of noble birth——"

"Do not make too many confessions, Batavius," said Virginia sweetly. "I warn you, I shall tell Lady Rose all that you say."

"I wish her to know how deeply I respect and admire her! That I must confess."

"Well, then," snapped Madame, "now that thy confession is made, will thou eat some chicken pie?"

"I have no objection, mother. Chicken pie is quite proper after such a fine compliment!"

"Batavius, do be quiet."

"I will not be quiet, Harry. When a man is pleased, he may say so."

"I hope I may remember all you have said, Batavius."

"I hope you will, Virginia."

"Come, come! Eat thy pie and forget the Lady Rose," and Madame spoke with scorn and temper. "Her compliments are only words."

"There now, Katrina, that is enough. A good pie thou brought me; let me eat it in peace. As for Lady Rose, good and pretty she is, and beautifully she dresses herself."

"Dresses herself! yes. In that way she makes men love her—men of sense, too."

"Indeed, Madame," said Harry Rutgers, "it is the men of sense who make the readiest and best fools in the world."

"Then a man of sense I am," added Batavius, "for if a lovely woman I see, my heart instantly beats at my lips. It is my way."

"Too much talk about love you are making," said the Captain. "If a man loves, he loves, and there it is. What news from the city, Harry?"

"Everything is now quiet, but tomorrow Governor Colden ought to take oaths to carry the Stamp Tax into effect. The people are only waiting to see if he will dare to take it. I think he will."

"That is also what I think. Some say he is a coward, but, Harry, I have seen men who feared death but who did not fear to do their duty."

"The spirit willing, the flesh weak, that is the great undoing, Captain," and Harry fell into gloomy retrospection. A silence followed, and Virginia rose and asked her mother's leave to retire. "I have been good, moeder?" she whispered.

"Very good."

"May I go now?"

"Yes, go and sleep. Do not wake and cry."

Then she kissed her mother and father, and gave her hand to Harry and Batavius. But Batavius followed her to the door, and as she stood with it half-open he held her by the arm, and let his grasp close on her so cruelly tight that she could not help a cry of pain. Madame looked up quickly, her face inquisitive and angry, and Harry rose and went towards Batavius.

"We are going now, Batavius," he said. "Come! I have no time to lose."

Virginia looked gratefully at Harry, and finding herself free, fled swiftly to her room. And as soon as the two men were outside the house, Harry asked angrily, "What were you doing, or saying, to Miss Van Vroom?"

"My own will," mumbled Batavius sullenly.

"You have shown a vile temper tonight, and I have a mind never to speak to you again."

This was a result Batavius did not wish. Both in a business and a social way Harry Rutgers was of importance.

"You ought to excuse much, Harry, to a miserable lover. Virginia is too provoking."

"Miss Van Vroom is perfect."

"We have had a quarrel. I wanted to make it up. I dare say she is fretting about me now."

"I think it is very likely, after the black pinching you gave her."

"None of your business, is it, Harry Rutgers?"

"Captain De Vries, we will take different roads for the future"—and Harry, without further words, strode away at a pace Batavius did not care to follow.

In the meantime Virginia was dropping tears over the bruised arm as she bathed it in some medicated lavender water. She was as frightened of the man as if he was an ogre, and she lay awake many hours trying to form some plan of escape, if Rose failed her. For Rose's letter did not still her fears. Rose had promised so much, and there was yet no certainty that she had accomplished anything. The girl was utterly wretched.

For a few hours her will had put her misery under her feet and she had apparently been happy and cheerful, but as soon as she was alone this false mood fell from her like a garment—fell heavy as lead to her feet. It was not only her hatred and terror of Batavius, or her anxiety about her marriage, that distressed her; there was a bitterer drop in the cup of her sorrow—it was Joris. He was thinking everything evil of her, and she did not deserve it. It was misery to think of Joris, but oh, if she was forced to marry, she would have to cease thinking of Joris in any way. It would be a sin to think of him. She would have to bury every memory of him.

The next day dawned at last, the day which the newspapers called the "last day of Liberty!" It was a dark, wintry dawn, full of gloomy forebodings. The Captain went early into the city, and came home early with a headache and a heartache.

"Not long did thou stay to-day, Jan. Glad am I to see thee." And Madame smiled her approval very pleasantly.

"Long enough I stayed, Katrina. I saw the Governor take oaths to carry out the Stamp Act, then I came home to thee. My heart was heavy."

"Well, Jan, he has sworn to make us use the Stamps; can he do it?"

Jan laughed. "He can not, Katrina, nor can he find a man in the city, or out of the city, who will dare to make the attempt."

"How then?"

"No one wants to kill the old man, if he will do what is just and right; yet John Watts told us, he was fortified as if he had been at Bergen-op-Zoom when the French besieged it with one hundred thousand men. That is what makes the people's blood run high and hot—that, more than anything else. The papers to-day are all dated, 'October thirty-first, the last day of Liberty.' I like not such words. It is not the last day of Liberty; no, indeed! It is the dawn of Liberty!"

"If a little sleep thou would take, Jan, it would be good for thee. So weary was thy step, so pale thy face."

"Yes, I will go to sleep. To-night there is a great meeting of the merchants at Burns' Tavern. We are going to strike another blow at the trade of England. Yes, yes. She will see. She will feel. We will shut up all her mills, and turn her weavers and mechanics hungry into the streets."

"The poor people! Not their fault it is."

"The poor people will make the King and Parliament listen to them. They will not listen to us. Far away are we, but thousands of starving English workmen will call at their doors with no runaway knock. They will be forced to answer them. Yes, indeed!"

In the evening Jan was among the first of the great company of merchants who met to consummate their war with the trade and industries of England. They were going to compel the liberty of the English workingmen to fight the tyranny of the English government. It was a thoughtful, dignified meeting, and after it adjourned between two and three hundred of the largest importers and dealers in New York signed their names to the most radical agreement they could frame.

"A strong paper it is," said Jan to Katrina, as they sat together discussing the proceedings, "and Judge Robert Livingston said that England would suffer more by it in one year than the Stamp Tax could ever recompense."

"Well, then, Jan, what of it?"

"It renewed and made more stringent our agreement—no English goods are to be imported, and no English clothing is to be worn. Lawyers are not to issue a stamped writ, merchants are not to clear out a vessel which has British relations, and coast vessels are to enter and depart without stamped papers. The courts are enjoined to sit without reference to the Stamp Act, and newspapers are to be printed and sold in defiance of it. By common and nearly universal consent, business is to go on as if no Stamp Act existed."

"Some there are who will not mind your agreements—Alexander Semple, for instance."

"Well, then, Alexander Semple will have to shut his shop, and abuse the Liberty Boys and the Colonial Congress in his own house, Katrina."

"Against the colonists Janet Semple will not let him speak one word. Also, I have heard that she has an ugly little dog she calls 'King George,' and cross words, and a kick or two, the creature gets if the Elder dares to say the Liberty Boys do anything wrong. And that the Elder does not like, for he picked the dog up starving, and so has him in a kind of protection. Little Katherine Van Heemskirk told me about 'King George.' She says the creature runs to the cellar or stable whenever he hears the words 'Stamp Act.' Of Janet he is afraid."

Jan laughed, and then remarked in a pointed manner, "Others are afraid of Janet, as well as 'King George.'"

"A very dignified, masterful man is Elder Semple," said Katrina.

"There's a difference when he is at his own fireside. But that is a common occurrence, Katrina."

"Not your case, Jan."

"No! My rights I get at home and abroad."

"Was then this clear, strong paper of the Congress all?"

"New ground we took up, yes, indeed. A committee has been appointed to get the merchants of Philadelphia, Boston, and other cities throughout the colonies to stand with us."

"Will they, Jan?"

"I think they will. I am satisfied. To-morrow is the great day. I must be early on the street to-morrow."

But early as Jan was astir, he found the streets crowded, and the crowd watching every movement with an intense sense of the importance of not suffering a single stamp to be used. All night long, and from every quarter, men had been pouring into New York. General Gage, who watched this march of patriots, said "they came by thousands"—in boatloads over the North and East rivers, and in carriages of all kinds, down the thoroughfares of the island—old men and young men, rich men and poor men, whoever knew the meaning of the word Freedom, and was able to carry a musket, were on the streets of New York when the first of November, 1765, dawned. As the gray light came the bells of the city met it with muffled peals, and the beating of unbraced drums—while from every trading ship on the river the flags slowly rose to half-mast and hung drooping and motionless in the damp, misty air. The effect upon the multitude was enraging. A kind of sobbing, angry cry rang through the streets of the city they loved and were so proud of.
